"FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE YEAR EVEN UNTO THE END OF THE YEAR"

Rosh Hashonah, the New Year, is the most solemn day next to Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. The sound of the Shofar is for a day of judgment of the "God of Jacob". On this day all the inhabitants of the world pass before the Creator as sheep pass for examination under the eyes of the shepherd. Three books of account are opened for: the wicked; the righteous; the intermediate class. Of the wicked, the Psalm says: "Let them be blotted out of the living and not be written with the righteous." The names of the righteous are inscribed without delay as sealed "to live". The middle class has a ten-day respite until Yom Kippur to repent and mend their ways and outlook, while correcting some of their errors of the past. In Deuteronomy it says, "A land which the Lord thy God careth for: the eyes of the Lord are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year." On Rosh Hashonah every person's means of livelihood is allocated for the year to come; also, alas, his destined losses and set-backs. For good luck you are advised to eat pumpkins on the New Year, also fenugreeks, beets, and dates because in Aramaic they mean "plentiful" and "forgiveness".

Like the young Chinese who wrote on the fly leaf of a book about Confucius: "Confucius is dead but I am here and that is all that matters", Jews have a preoccupation with life. "May you be inscribed in the book of life" is the beautiful greeting of Jews at Rosh Hashonah, the New Year. Peace, justice, righteous living, freedom, mercy to the weak, all these are good. They are the Jewish ideals. But they must emerge out of life. A people of historical escapes, great catastrophes, and a rolling succession of tragedies through the ages, may be excused for having a rather morbid view of death. For them life is everything. To the living there remains the Jewish destiny of service to mankind through keeping its eye fixed on the foundation stone of man's basic purpose: to advance human brotherhood, for there is no other.

In the spring, at Passover time, the Jew is jaunty, in fine fettle. Nothing is dying except the winter. All of Nature is renewing itself and so does his self-confidence as continuity appears to be more than an illusion. "I will not die, but live," exults the Jew, "and proclaim the works of the Lord." But the New Year comes in the autumn when "the sere and yellow leaf" is pushed around by a chilling wind.

This year at Rosh Hashonah there is an unseen presence due to the Eichmann trial revelations which project the appalling destruction of six million Jews in such a way as to bring this greatest of the world's disasters up closer in time and sharper in outline than when it was happening. In contemplation the spirit falters, the strongest are crushed to the heart and shaken to the roots at what horrors lie just under the onion-skin veneer of civilization; pale and tearful over the suffering, the sorrowing, the terrors of immolation, the losses in talent, genius, creativity, and irreplaceable treasures of every kind, never to be regained. Are the Nations in the line-up before their Creator on this Day of Judgment? If not, why not?

When Jews greet each other at the New Year they wish each other health, happiness, prosperity, more life, and lots of it. No one says, "May you be inscribed in the book of life so that you may make use of the biblical ideals to guide your way of living for the benefit of your own character and the betterment of your group." But the ancient Jewish principles which rest on the Mosaic Code and which form the basis of civilization, at least in recitation, constantly await translation into meaning for the daily life of all men. As the originators of these fundamental rules the Jews have a greater duty toward helping to make them concrete than any other group.

The basic Jewish principles are sensible and practical. There is nothing otherworldly about them and they were not intended to be held within the covers of a book for safe-keeping. The Jewish values make for individual character and within the strong bonds of family attachment become the underpinnings of a household. What happens within any one household should be of the utmost importance to the commonwealth. There the Jewish philosophy of life is founded on attitudes concerning the treatment of the stranger, the toiler, the beast in the field, the fatherless, the weak, the small, with specific admonitions that stress justice and not charity, human rights rather than benefaction. This system of living requires effort. Its ultimate aim is peace, happiness, and security for all human beings.

Judaism is stern. It does not countenance anything less than the root belief that every man is his brother's keeper, and proceeding from that, it regards the promotion of good will as a major individual and group obligation supported countless times by biblical admonition. But these are the sterile days which Amos, the Prophet, predicted, when the Lord would send a time of famine, "not of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord."

At a time when it is all too clear that civilization needs a return to a consideration of "first things" to reduce conflict and improve the distribution of all the good things of the good life, and when it should be the role of the Jewish group to keep in front of the world the place of humanity first before property, its resolution is weakened by the insatiable appetite for heaping up wealth, gadgets, and worldly goods that is common to this era. When that occurs, moral fibre is displaced and the creeping peril of decadence has its way.

"May you be inscribed in the book of life so that you will work for the establishment of the highest standards in Jewish responsibility." This requires fidelity to the family values lest they be subverted, for no group is stronger than its individual households; to individual ethics which make the ethics of the group and of the nations; to the common good which means opposition to war, hunger, oppression, national arrogance, injustice, and the corroding poverty which renders self-realization impossible for so much of humanity.

Jews were not meant to be indifferent. They are supposed to pray daily for welfare, peace, loving kindness, and mercy where justice alone is not enough. The human society they are supposed to stand for is one built on equality, tolerance, and mutual aid. For this attitude to be real and authentic it cannot remain in the verbal custody of rabbis and other teachers. It has to be built in. Jews will have to be Jews with the solidarity that characterizes Quakers as Quakers, and mean what they say they believe. The whole obligation can be summed up in the phrase from the story of the Exodus: "I, and not my messenger."

Notes Of A Speech On The Anniversary Of Ukrainian Canadian Settlement In Canada

BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE JOHN G. DIEFENBAKER, Q.C., M.P., PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA, AT WINNIPEG, MANITOBA

The meeting in Vienna early in June of President Kennedy and Mr. Khrushchev showed that the Soviet attitude on all the major international problems is unbending. No one expected a reversal of Soviet policy. The free nations have learned from long experience to be realistic in dealing with the Communists. But there was a widespread hope that Mr. Khrushchev, who has talked so much about peace, might at least on this occasion show a willingness to compromise.

Let us look at the record:

(1) In Laos the Communists profess to be supporting neutrality and independence but in fact are making it difficult for the International Supervisory Commission to secure those objectives.

(2) Three years of work on a treaty designed to end the testing of nuclear weapons has apparently come to nothing because the Soviet Union refuses to allow an effective system for inspecting possible violations.

(3) The Soviet leaders have recently adopted a new principle of a three-headed administration which they are seeking to establish in all international bodies in which they are participating. This principle is put forward in the form of a demand that the three main groups of nations in the world, Western, Communist bloc, and neutral countries, should have equal representation and that they should agree on all courses of action.

Consider what this means. It means that the Soviet Union cannot tolerate the idea of an impartial international civil service. It means that there is a Soviet threat to the effective existence of the United Nations. It means that the Soviet Union has put itself deliberately into a position to assert its veto on any form of international action that might not be to its liking.

Because of this new Soviet approach, the outlook for progress on disarmament is discouraging, although bilateral talks between the United States and the U.S.S.R. have taken place in Washington and further talks are in prospect. On disarmament the Canadian Government has played a prominent role and the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not ceased to advocate keeping the way open for serious negotiation. These efforts will not be discontinued.

Nevertheless, it must not be forgotten that the problem of disarmament has defied solution down through the centuries, and that there can never be effective disarmament in the absence of mutual trust and agreed measures of inspection. The Communist leaders, by their suspicion of Western motives, and by their thirst for world supremacy, are making a mockery of the hopes of mutual trust. By their intransigence they have stifled the chances of agreement on measures of inspection either with regard to nuclear weapons testing or in the more general field of disarmament.

In these circumstances, I believe in the necessity for unremitting concentration on Western defence and Western unity and co-operation in the political and economic fields. The need for Western co-operation is apparent in view of the situation in Berlin. In the past three years Mr. Khrushchev has issued many dire warnings about Berlin, but this time it appears that he intends to precipitate a political crisis. He says that he intends to sign a peace treaty with East Germany before the end of this year.

The Soviet leaders should not under-estimate the determination of the West to maintain the freedom of the people of West Berlin. Marxist doctrine teaches that the forces of history are on the side of the Communists. This gives them a feeling of confidence which could lead them to unwise courses.

For the West it will be of paramount importance to avoid the pitfalls both of weakness and unreasonable rigidity. We need to be strong and unhesitating in our defence of essential Western rights and obligations. We need at the same time to maintain a calm judgment so that we will not overlook possibilities of compromise which, without amounting to appeasement, might nonetheless contribute to peace.

Those who have lived through two terrible world wars are acutely conscious of one important fact. It is that neither of those wars might have started had the aggressors known the real strength and the will to resist of those they sought to conquer and enslave.

We must not forget this important lesson of the past. In this age when mankind has a greater capacity than ever before to destroy himself, the only guarantee of peace in the absence of an acceptable world-wide disarmament agreement, is found in the manifest determination of free countries to unite their defence efforts in a common front as a warning

The Shofar's Blast: A Call For Self-Appraisal

BY RABBI I. L. HAUSMAN, OF ADATH JESHURUN HADRATH KODESH SYNAGOGUE, OF MONTREAL

Men have been eager throughout the centuries to improve their way of life. Society, which in every generation is highly opinionated, and judges according to its own sense of value, has judged whether this perpetual aspiration has met with success. This impelling force to improve has left its mark upon the religious life of each era; and now, the common cry, "return to religion", encourages a thorough study as to why the impulse to stray from religion arose.

Let us turn back a few pages of Jewish history. In Europe, no longer ago than the mid-nineteenth century, the Jew had come to regard the ability to suffer as a necessity of living. Second class citizenship, with its daily economic and social restrictions, was taken for granted. The ideals of a rational identity, firmly rooted in a homeland, were looked upon as a prophetic dream, rather than as an immediate practical reality. The closing walls of oppression, stifled the resounding clamour to escape. A wide sharing of the Jewish plight was the only comfort.

Religion helped the Jews to maintain the satisfaction of being loved, loved by their Creator, but it failed to satisfy their deep yearning for this profound value to be present amongst all men. Their faith kept a sense of self respect; it gave them a feeling of dignity and joy, rather than a natural dominant value for a way of life.

The untransferable values, traditions, customs, and ceremonies, were the only jewels left uncoveted by the anti-Jewish forces in power. The ultimate of Jewish pride was the consoling distinction of theological scholarship. To possess Talmudic knowledge was for the young and old to possess the noblest prize. Judaism and Judaic culture were the bloodlines of the people, manifested by their faith, practice, and scholarship.

About the turn of the century, world opinion, originating in the English-speaking world and parts of Europe, together with recurrent pogroms and internal strife in Eastern Europe and Russia, forced a breach in the political, social, and economic walls of the worst oppressors of the Jewish people. The open door policy of the United States and Canada encouraged a mass exodus of the Jews and gave rise to a new hope and opportunity. Unprecedented advantages now seemed within easy reach. The Golden Land, "the cities paved in gold" were readily accessible. It was simply a matter of completing a passport request form, buying a boat ticket, and, upon arrival, passing a physical examination.

For many, the weeks after their arrival were most disappointing, for then came the shattering of a dream. The weeks of unemployment, discomfort, and growing fear, the sense of not being wanted! Despair was written on the faces of the men and women who were "fortunate" enough to toil in the sweat-shops from early morning till the late evening hours. Along with all these disappointments, frustrations, and the sense of defeat came a deeper misfortune, the ebbing away of faith.

The Sabbath, so long cherished by the Jewish people as a day of physical and spiritual replenishment, became a growing obstacle to employment in the new world. Those who were willing to sacrifice the Holy Sabbath, found employment more readily available. Many thousands did so, and made the first sacrifice for a slight economic gain. This radical breach of tradition created a new and strange atmosphere of a more serious nature. It gave encouragement to a new psychological and social pattern unknown in centuries past, but came to be known as "acceptance", the acceptance of an apparent worldly necessity.

Regrettably, the Synagogue took on a new meaning with diminished significance for the Jewish masses. With the exception of a few holidays, the Synagogue belonged to a minority of the rich and the conscientious. Those who remained staunch and courageous in the faith, often had to pay a heavy toll for their loyalty to the Lord. They earned what they could consistent with their sense of religious and moral obligations. Many of them suffered pitifully from a sense of hardship imposed on their families. To the younger generation it seemed that their religion would "condemn" them to poverty. Quite unfairly they came to view the laws and practices of Israel as ancient and out-dated. Through this disastrous process of "free mental association" which separated religion from material well-being, they developed unhappy emotions and warped sentiments regarding traditional Judaism.

The Jewish community found it hard in many ways to compete with the challenges of these most trying years. In offering a Jewish schooling it was hard to compete with the public schools. To the young child, the class-room of the modern public school seemed a palace compared to the back room and basements provided for their religious instruction which served to build and strengthen character. Few competent instructors were available who understood both the art of teaching and the English tongue. Even the capable "melamed" (primary instructor) was difficult to find. Rabbis; ritual slaughterers of animals for food; and teachers were deplorably few.

This class stayed, as long as possible, in the old country, constituting a major portion of the religious intelligentsia which chose to remain close to the ghetto and traditional soil, rather than to face the challenge, and make a contribution to the transplanted communities of the new world. However human and understandable their reasons, the result was bad. In North America, with some exceptions, most of the faculties in the numerous afternoon schools were unequipped to educate and spiritually encourage the confused children of the early twentieth century Jewish settlement. Besides a few scattered seminaries, all-day parochial schools and well-run Talmud Torahs were almost extinct.

The immediate financial and economic problems handicapped the community fathers in their ambition to plan for the future by equipping and developing a better educational system. As a result of this condition an uncoordinated educational programme caused a "solution of continuity", a destructive breach in the religious traditions, which came near to inducing a spiritual paralysis. Many felt some spiritual satisfaction from the financial support they gave to their destitute relatives who lived in the impoverished Jewish communities of Europe. Others gained a degree of spiritual solace from their generous contributions to the European and Palestinian seminaries, homes for the aged, and orphan asylums, which for the most part depended on the benevolent philanthropy of North American Jewry. United States and Canadian Jewry symbolized the helping hand of charity, rather than a combined symbol with religious practice and faith.

To the many who had for so many years been frustrated by their inability to create a rich cultural and deeply rooted religious Jewish life on North American soil, their only consolation was to escape their conscience by creating a psychological separation between religion and daily life. Many tended to think the high standard of living and its misleading notions of progress and modernity belonged to North America while poverty and a vibrant, flourishing religion belonged to their brethern who lived in foreign lands. Until the late 1930's (and in some parts of North America till this very day) traditional Judaism was looked upon as a decadent religious movement. The religious leaders and senior traditional laymen were slowly dying out and there were literally few to replace them.

The majority of the young adults, and middle-aged men and women added themselves to an ever increasing "lost generation". They were lost to the spiritual values of their inheritance; the multiple traditions, the vast wisdom of the Talmud, and the great teachings and commandments of their faith. Aside from the minimum requirements to preserve their Jewish identity (the ritual circumcision, the Bar-Mitzvah celebration, the wedding ceremony, and the observance of the High Holy Days) too many were (and still are) Jews simply by birth and would terminate this Jewishness in the Jewish cemetery, which held their ancestors, and in the

The Hebrew University Helps Israel, Jewry, And Mankind

BY ALLAN BRONFMAN, OF MONTREAL, NATIONAL PRESIDENT OF THE CANADIAN FRIENDS OF THE HEBREW UNIVERSITY IN JERUSALEM

Canadian Jewry, and, indeed, Jewry everywhere, at this time cannot help but take cognizance of the fact that the two main ideologies in the world are locked in a momentous struggle, one which could (may God forbid) obliterate our civilization. Many, perhaps too many, are fatalistic about it; they shrug their shoulders in a helpless attitude of "this is bigger than I, what can I do about it?"

It is a problem about which, admittedly, individuals can do very little. But the very little they can do is most important. There is no question that Canadian Jewry has done and will continue to do its utmost to keep the light of freedom burning throughout Canada. This goes without saying, for this is our home, and our home means much to us.

But what of Israel, the sanctuary for thousands of our beleaguered brethren? We can do much, we can do much more for this small young nation, the home of the Jewish spirit. It is not bigger than we are, and we cannot, we dare not leave it to chance or fate or accident. What of the still hostile nations that surround her? What of the thousands of people in North Africa and, yes, in Russia, who, if given a chance, would seek the haven of Israel's shores? What of the needs of the people who already live in Israel, needs that undoubtedly will mushroom and increase tremendously with the cessation of German reparations funds?

Are the Jewish people in Israel up to it? Is World Jewry and yes, Canadian Jewry, prepared for emergencies that may come to Israel? Let us hope and pray that, when needed, Jewry everywhere will be able to meet the challenge with full heart, in full measure, and with the consciousness that they are helping to build and strengthen the very crucible of Jewish life itself.

In Israel, on the side of Jewry and of freedom-loving peoples the world over, there stands a centre of strength, stamina, and hope. It is the Hebrew University, which now has some 7,500 students and researchers on its campus in Jerusalem; in its gigantic new Medical Centre at Ein Karem; at its expanding Agricultural Faculty at Rehovoth; and at its flourishing branch in Tel Aviv. From this great centre of learning, Israel and her people are gaining the knowledge and the know-how with which to build a strong, healthy, and intelligent nation, for not only does the University train the many professional people needed for the consolidation and progress of the country, but, moreover, it conducts research in fields scientific and spiritual, which cannot help but enrich and enlighten the lives of Israel's people.

The results of this research serve not only Israelis, but Jewry abroad and, yes, all humanity. Every Jew in Canada must have experienced a feeling of pride at hearing of Professor Yadin's recent Bar Kochba discoveries, which shed such wondrous light on a great chapter in Jewish heroism. The newly-founded Afro-Asian nations must have thrilled to the news that recently emerged from the University in Jerusalem that a new "solar energy package" had been perfected, one capable of supplying economical power for a complete small village in countries where the sun is the main source of potential energy. Is there a nation within the World Health Organization which does not marvel at the Hebrew University's great progress in the field of cancer research; or the current plan to establish within her present Medical Faculty, a complete school for the training of doctors and nurses for Africa and Asia?

During this summer, the Hebrew University again displayed the role it has to play in everyday Jewish life when it convened the third World Congress for Jewish Studies which was attended by nearly 1,000 Jewish scholars from all over the world. Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion declared his gratification that Jewish learning had now returned to its ancestral home and that Israel had become the centre for all branches of Jewish studies. And as a further manifestation of this, only recently the Hebrew University initiated a special one-year course for some fifty young North American students who came to its campus to acquire an extensive knowledge of Hebrew and to receive an introduction to the fundamentals of Jewish thought, history, and literature.

All of this is progress that reflects not only on Israel, but on Jews and mankind everywhere, and one of the major resolutions of Jewry in Canada must be, cannot help but be, that during the year ahead intensified help and assistance shall go forward to this house of higher learning which, despite many difficulties, is effectively doing so much, for Israel, for Jewry everywhere, for civilization. We have been privileged to participate in this era of the triumphant reawakening of the Jewish spirit.

The Long-Neglected Bene-Israel Community Of India

BY DR. BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, 12 MARKDALE AVENUE, TORONTO, LECTURER AT THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO SCHOOL OF SOCIAL WORK, WHO SPENT LAST YEAR IN MYSORE, INDIA, ON THE FACULTY OF THE ADVANCED STUDY AND TRAINING CENTER OF THE WORLD ASSEMBLY OF YOUTH

During recent months, a controversy has raged in Israel around the Bene-Israel Jews from India, of whom seven thousand had settled in Israel after the establishment of the State. The issue came to a head when a young Indian Jew, who had served in the Israeli army, asked to marry a "sabra", (a native-born Israeli,) and the marriage was not allowed by the Chief Rabbi of Israel. It seems that the Bene-Israel Jews were not considered as "Jews", and "mixed" marriages are not allowed in Israel.

Pressures from all sides have been made on Rabbi Nissim to change his ruling. David Ben-Gurion, Prime Minister of Israel, declared: "The Jews of the Bene-Israel are Jews like all other Jews, and there is no basis for disqualifying them."

Who are the Bene-Israel Jews of India? What is their origin? My wife and I have just returned from a one-year stay in India, and while there, had the privilege of visiting the various Jewish communities in this fascinating country.

In order to understand this group of Jews, one has to understand a little of India. India has 438 million people; there are 17 major languages spoken in the country; Hindus form the largest religious group (80%), and Moslems are about ten per cent of the population. Christians, Sikhs, Jains, Buddhists and Jews are other religious groups found in India. In 1950, there were twenty-five thousand Jews in India, of which about twenty thousand belonged to the Bene-Israel group. Most of them live in the area in and around the city of Bombay. They speak Marathi, the language of that part of India.

Our first acquaintance with this ancient community of Jews took place right after our arrival in Bombay, on our way to Mysore. We met Rabbi Gryn, who had been sent by the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (Reform), for a period of two years to help this community. Rabbi Gryn had done an excellent job, and a flourishing synagogue and religious school were evidence of his patient and hard work. He spoke Marathi, and had learned the customs of India, and was a scholar in Sanskrit. He had brought back Jewish identification to the Bene-Israel.

The Bene-Israel, or Children of Israel, are said to have arrived in India twenty centuries ago. One historical view is that the Bene-Israel belong to the lost Ten Tribes of Israel. History would have us believe that the Bene-Israel had left Palestine about 175 B.C. They travelled along the trade routes opened by King Solomon and a small group landed in India, after many hardships and disasters. The craft in which they were travelling encountered a severe storm, and seven men and seven women survived and landed in the village of Navgam, in Bombay State.

As this community grew, they were very apprehensive of strangers, and feared persecutions. They kept themselves in the background of Indian life around them. The early settlers called themselves "Shanwar Tellis", or "Saturday Oilmen". Somehow, these settlers worked for six days, and rested on the Sabbath, as enjoined by Mosaic Laws. The vocation of "oil pressing" is explained by an interesting story.

It is told that the Bene-Israel women were very beaut'ful, and the community wanted to ensure their safety. Thus, in order to place them beyond the reach of any prospective violator, they attached to themselves the "stigma of untouchability". The settlers chose to work as "oil pressers" because that was the vocation of the lowest caste then in existence. Thus, if you were identified as a "low caste", no one would "touch you" for fear of breaking the rigid caste rules which were part of Indian life. You were literally isolated and could not mix with the other castes.

With the passage of time, the Bene-Israel began to integrate themselves with their surroundings, adapting freely the customs of the people among whom they worked. These came from Hindu and Moslem influences.

Most of the Jewish religious ceremonies and practices were slowly forgotten. What they had, however, kept throughout all their trials and tribulations, were: the strict observance of Sabbath, circumcision, and the Hebrew reading of the "Keriyath Shema", the holy formula of "Hear, O, Israel, the Lord, our God, The Lord is One". They had retained these all-important Hebrew words as their only link with the religious past. This prayer was used on all sacred occasions such as at meals, weddings, and burials. The Bene-Israel had the pathetic belief that the "Shema" constituted the sum and substance of their religion.

There were two turning points in their history. About three hundred years ago, David Rahabi, a travelling Jew, found himself in the midst of this community. He discovered that he was in the midst of Hebrews. He proceeded to acquaint the Bene-Israel with the various tenets of Judaism. It is believed that he was put to death by a local chief. After his death the Bene-Israel continued to live, pray and worship after his guidance. Synagogues were built all over Western India. In 1796, Ezekiel Diveka, a Jewish soldier with the East India Company, built a

Travellers' Aid, The "Neighbour Away From Home", Sees The Pageant Of "Moving People" In Trouble

BY B. CAPLAN, PRESIDENT, AND ARTHUR H. KIRSCH, VICE-PRESIDENT, OF THE TRAVELLERS' AID SOCIETY OF MONTREAL, 714 VITRE STREET WEST

Travellers' Aid is exciting. It deals with people on the move. In a way it is a story of our country, of our ancestors who came here, no doubt thinking: "We don't know where we're going but, we're on our way". Today the people who come for help are looking for greener pastures. Jobs have been hard to get. Many think that surely in Montreal there will be a place for them. Some seek adventure. Others are confused. People of all ages run away as a kind of escape from pressures that are too great, only to find their problems go right along with them, like the ever present shadow.

Yes, many people become stranded, in trouble in Montreal. These are people for whom Travellers' Aid is organized, to help. Travellers' Aid is the expression of the concern of the people of Montreal for those who pass through or come, as strangers, to Montreal. Apart from the fact that, as Walter Lippmann once said, "There is no surer test of the quality of civilization than its attitude toward the stranger within its gates", Travellers' Aid is an important and economical form of social insurance for the community.

Travellers' Aid workers are located at the portals of the city to help travellers who are in trouble before their problems get "out of bounds" and become a threat to our city. Stranded people, bereft of their normal "props" of family and property, are potentially desperate people, unless their plight is recognized and the emergency help they need is given. The skill and experience of the professionally trained social workers, many of whom are multi-lingual, who are employed by the Society, can detect and intercept the psychotic stranger and help him to secure the medical care and attention he needs before he gets into the community where he may be a danger to himself and the community.

In Montreal Travellers' Aid service dates back to June, 1900, when it was established by the Y. W. C. A. as a "protection" to girls to "save" them when they came to the big cities from Europe or from our own rural areas. Then settlers came, followed by the "picture brides" who came and still come, lured by correspondence triggered by the "Lonely Hearts" columns of periodicals. War brides came following the end of the two World Wars. Homeless men and boys of the 30's, "Knights of the Road", "rode the rods" back and forth on the railroads, across the country and required service. Service was extended to dependents of enlisted men, displaced persons, and immigrants from many countries. The strain of this was reached in the early part of the century, practically stopped throughout the period of the two wars, increased sharply, and is now continuing at a more modified pace. Refugees from Hungary and Yugoslavia followed, and latterly TB immigrants came as part of the program of World Refugee Year. The aged, the young, the inexperienced, repatriated Canadians, visitors, tourists, all require service. One seems to see a pageant passing in review.

As it had become evident that persons of all types required Travellers' Aid service, a survey was conducted in 1950, by Bertha McCall, formerly director general of National Travellers' Aid Association, under the aegis of the Montreal Council of Social Agencies. This established clearly that the clientele had changed in character and included people of all national backgrounds, facets, and ages, and both sexes. It was, in truth, a non-sectarian, multiple-function service essential in Montreal. As such, it warranted the organization of an autonomous agency.

Accordingly, a provisional board was set up with representation from the entire community and a charter was obtained on November 22, 1951, under the terms of the Quebec Companies Act to give a thorough and organized service to that group known as "moving people", including travellers, transients, migrants or non-residents when in need of assistance and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing:

To carry out social case-work, including case-work treatments, travel service for the protection of the inexperienced and handicapped, and specialized information service; to maintain facilities for a prompt and effectual intercity service; to cooperate with public and private social work groups and other forces in the community; to carry out the study of migration and transiency and the causes and effects of such, as well as the development of resources for the benefit of those groups for whom it assumes responsibility where

The Life Of Encounter

BY DAVID WEISS, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF BARON DE HIRSCH INSTITUTE AND JEWISH CHILD WELFARE BUREAU OF MONTREAL

"Be yourself!", is often said by the wife to the husband who is acting up. It is a familiar rejoinder in every kind of dialogue when someone seems to be getting out of hand, or behaving in a manner that is not usual. Idiomatic as this may be, this phrase points to the heart of the daily irritations, exasperations, and disquietude of people everywhere. How can one be one's self in the highly pressured activities of modern life? There are so many duties to perform and obligations to observe. Schedules demand fulfilment; appointments must be kept, quotas adhered to in the daily give and take transactions we are all so involved in.

This inability to be one's authentic self becomes the root kernel around which growing and diffused despair originates. Despair attends the de-humanizing processes in modern organizational life, in the specializations of 20th Century living. This despair is fed by the sense of distance and lack of relation between the individual and the world he traverses but feels apathetic about. Through newspapers, T.V., films, etc., one learns as from afar about the United Nations disputes, Summit meetings that are frustrated, and what is happening all over the world without a sense of participation. At one and the same time most people feel disengaged, detached, uninvolved. It is, as one author says, "A World I Never Made".

How can a person be in-the-world, feel part of and involved in it, and thus have a sense of human relatedness? This question is not only a perplexing problem for our Space-Age. It was reflected in earlier times. Shakespeare admonished his hearers, "This above all, to thine own self be true". How can one be above all, to transcend the daily grinds, the pressing social, business, and casual transactions which wear away and erode the sense of being, of well-being and relatedness?

The answer lies in a dual ability to look inside oneself and to see outside into the world. This binocular vision yields the wisdom to be for one's self at the same time as one is part of the world.

To grow up means to become conscious that our world demands adaptation, socialized performance of every individual, in order to transmit a society from one generation to the other, and for the purposes of fulfilling our production and consumer culture. In this way our political and social economies function. These systems insist that each individual, particularly by the time of adolescence, must locate his status and role within them. "To find a place in the world", and to fulfill personal existence and social responsibilities are the dynamic forces and goals of child-rearing, education, religion, and many social institutions.

Our present stress and anxiety about "security" with respect to the status and role we wish for ourselves or our children, reflects on our inability to come to grips with and therefore to overcome, the deflecting aims and tensions between adapting to the social realties that impact on the person and his inner struggle to realize his potentialities, to become an actual person.

Underneath all this is man's concern these days that he is thought of by invisible powers, by "hidden persuaders", only as part of a statistical average. It is depersonalizing to feel that we may be only integers, numbers, clusters, or units which can be defined, manipulated and nicely categorized in accordance with public opinion polls, surveys, etc. This goes against the inner grain. One itches. It denies the individuality of the person, sets conflict in motion since our value system gives so much credence to the sanctity of the person in all his unique differences.

Questions arise as to how a person can be free and yet related to any system, ranging from the primary ensemble of the family to the highly complex ensemble of citizenship in a nation. Before one can belong to any group, one must belong to one's self, and this truth leads to the question of being as such. In the words of Exodus, every person must say, "I am that I am". One must establish one's own center of existence on which to stand firmly and honestly in confronting the entries and exits of the labyrinths and mazes of modern life.

By establishing one's center of being, the specific center of gravity of being which is maturity, one immediately can be freed to say yes or no to circumstances and situations. In accordance with his awareness and understanding of himself, his actual potentials and skills, the individual can move and grow into taking on the responsibilities that go with freedom in our world. From true being, one becomes a human personality, that knows love, can give and receive relationships. This is the process of discovery, of unfoldment, of encountering truth, beauty, joy, love, real life.

This is the way by which we take on the otherwise alien and threatening world of social, political, and physical reality to make it into a human world, a personal and social reality, which dispels the despair that eats away at each of us. The consequence of this despair is to push people from relatedness into detachment, from meaningful ac-

A Musicologist's Controversy: The Great Debate On The "Originality" Of Jewish Music

BY REVEREND NATHAN STOLNITZ, 511 MARKHAM STREET, TORONTO, ONTARIO

Musical scholars for years have been in conflict and dispute on whether or not there is such a thing as pure Jewish music. The musicologists of various periods disagree in their theories and hypotheses, using hair-splitting arguments on this question which to this day has not been fully decided. While some insist vehemently that our music is thoroughly original and independent, tracing its beginning to Biblical days, others argue to the contrary and allow themselves to go so far as to say that there is no such thing as Jewish music which in their view is nothing more than a transfer on "re-fill" from foreign sources.

These differences among music historians have incidentally created an entire literature on the subject. Some, after years of study and wandering in a sea of apparent inconsistencies, have given up in disappointment. The late Elijah Zaludkowsky confessed to me, in a correspondence I exchanged with him on the subject, that after lengthy research and intensive study, one only learns that one actually knows very little.

A similar view was held by M. S. Geshury, of Jerusalem, when he spoke to the first conference of cantors and conductors in Palestine in 1939. After much effort and examination, he said, we are only at the very beginning of our understanding of the birth and growth of our music. In the "History of Hazanuth", published thirty years ago in New York, we find a detailed study of the place of music in earlier cultures. (Professor Idelsohn, of course, has dealt with this matter in careful and exhaustive fashion but we cannot quote from him in this limited essay.)

In an article in this volume by the late Cantor Pinchas Minkowsky, who was rightly dubbed the Prince of Cantors, he mentions that at certain epochs Jews were influenced in their music by Egyptian and Phoenician style of song. Later, Minkowski says this about the Greeks:

> "If we want to stay near the truth we must admit that the musical heritage of Greece, which then dominated the civilized world, did not leave the Jews untouched. The Jews, who were primarily a God-intoxicated, theological people who considered all things beautiful, music included, as only a means to an end, a religious end, could not compete with the Hellenes who were an aesthetic nation standing at that time at the very pinnacle of art and science and who looked upon music as a higher form of art and as a goal in itself."

Jacob Boimel, writing in the same book on the theme of Jewish music and the cantor, handles this thesis in a much more outspoken fashion. He states that there is no doubt that there was a direct influence of Greek music and that it was even brought directly into the service of the Temple. Many of the aristocrats of the priestly caste were followers of Hellenistic ways and were acculturated, almost assimilated, one might say, to Greek musical culture. At the same time, however, he agrees that the basis and core of Jewish music is drawn from our own Jewish masters of song.

The bond between prophecy and music was a firm one in those olden days. The men of the spirit, the prophets, who in their rapturous frenzies created music and poetry for our prayers, can truly be called the founders of Jewish music which in the course of centuries was penetrated by foreign elements, but so thoroughly Judaized in the process of borrowing that it emerged as a specifically Jewish art form.

"There is no doubt," writes Boimel, "that the music of the prophets influenced the music of the world of that day. It has ever been thus. The sacred music of religion has affected profane music and folk music and often the reverse has occurred."

J. Barondes points to the statement of a Christian music scholar that the Irish, for instance, have taken the greater part of their music from the Jews, and a similar development has occurred with other people. "Art," he says, "is international and demands neither passport nor visa. Art is at home everywhere and is as free as the sky."

Israel Rabinowitz in his book, "Jewish Music" (first published in Montreal in 1940), demonstrates the close connection between traditional Jewish song and certain French Canadian folk melodies. His objective analysis of this is that the French Canadian folksong is in general strongly influenced by the Gregorian chant of the Catholic Church (in great part taken over by the early Christians). (According to a directive of Pope Gregory I, at the end of the sixth century of the Christian era, the ancient Jewish liturgical music was incorporated as the basis of church music.) Supported in this by previous musical scholars, Rabinowitz goes on to conclude: "The first Christians, who were Jews, knew no other prayer music than that of the Temple or of the many synagogues which then existed in Palestine."

We see a converse phenomenon, however, in Jewish music in a number of countries and, as it happens, in countries not far from Palestine, such as Turkey and several Balkan countries where the cantorial art has long played an important part in the life of the Sephardic Jews. Moshe Vital dealt with this subject in a lecture at the first cantors' conference in Palestine. (Vital was for many years a lecturer in liturgical music at a rabbinical seminary on the Aegean island of Rhodes.)

The lecturer demonstrated how almost the entire cantorial art of the Sephardic Jews is derived from the Turkish style of song and on a number of Arabic-based melodies. It is a quite natural phenomenon that the close ethnic and racial link between Jew and Arab, who from the earliest times lived and worked together, should be reflected in the musical similarities of these two peoples. It also happened in Turkey and in the Balkan lands. Even though the rabbis often protested and tried to forbid the intrusion of foreign tunes into the prayer book, eventually the practice and the will of the people prevailed and the Turkish and Arabic influences remained.

Not a single mediaeval Jewish versifier was placed in excommunication for this, as had actually happened some centuries before with some prayer composers who had attempted to introduce Grecian melodies into the prayers. This tolerance arose because the Arabic praying tunes, after all, were founded on a monotheistic faith whose emphasis was on the

What Canada Means To Me

BY LORNE ABRAMOVITCH, OF GARDENVIEW SCHOOL, IN ST. LAURENT, MONTREAL

The following citizenship essay took third Scholarship Prize in a contest held by the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal. The writer is thirteen years old, in Grade Seven; the son of Mr. and Mrs. Nathan Abramovitch; brother of Miss Marlene Abramovitch, seventeen; and Heather, seven; grandson of Isaac Abramovitch and the late Mrs. Abramovitch; and of the late Mr. and Mrs. Louis Haber.

Being a citizen of a free country, like our vast and beautiful Canada, is the most wonderful thing that can happen to any one. In this country a citizen can come and go as he pleases, because we practice the four freedoms: Freedom from want, where in this country there is everything that you require; we have all the food that we can eat, and eat as often as we wish. Freedom of worship, for in this country we can pray as we wish; whether you are a Protestant, Catholic, or Jew, you can attend the church of your choice. Freedom from fear, for in this country we fear no man. Freedom of speech, where a citizen can hold his own opinions and speak them freely.

The flag that waves over our great and beautiful country is called the Union Jack. It is a symbol of the free nation to which we belong. This flag guards and protects us from all harm.

Every right or privilege carries a duty with it. We say that we have a right to walk along the street without harm; that we have a right to the cap on our heads. This is true, but we must also understand that if it is our right to walk in peace, it is also our duty not to interfere with one another. If it is our right not to have our caps snatched from us, it is also our duty not to snatch the caps of others. If a schoolmate allows me to look at one of his books, it is my duty not to tear or deface it. The other side of every right or privilege is a duty, and one who is always demanding his rights and never thinks of his duties is either stupid or selfish.

I am proud to be a citizen of a wonderful young country which is constantly expanding in every possible field. Canada is rated on top in medical research, and industry, and has been a pioneer in a great many important medical and scientific advances. Canadian citizens are active in discovering new mineral sources, many of which are still to be found.

I am proud to be a citizen of a country of such rare beauty. The wonder of the stately Rocky Mountains, the beauty of Lake Louise, Banff National Park, eastward across the Prairie Provinces with the acres of golden wheat fields blowing in the summer breeze, further west our beautiful capital city of Ottawa, and our colourful sea ports on the east coast; and the delightful sunset in the Maritimes with the pink sun reflecting on the sails of the small fishing boats, all make me proud to be a citizen of a country where I am free to travel and see all these things; proud to be a citizen of a country with no barbed wire fences, where everyone of us has our say in our government.

New Year: The Season Of Our Discontent With Evil

BY DR. LOUIS J. CASHDAN, 61 BURNSIDE DRIVE, TORONTO, RABBI OF TEMPLE EMANU-EL

The title of a recent book by John Steinbeck, "The Winter Of Our Discontent", suggests a significant aspect of our High Holy Day Season. Rosh Hashonah is a day of inspiration; it is also a Day of Discontent, the time when we contrast what we are with what we ought to be. On the anniversary of creation, we voice our gratitude unto God for the precious gift of life. On the day of self-examination and spiritual inventory, the inner look of Rosh Hashonah impels us to ask: What have we done with our lives during the past year?

Discontent can be a corrective as well as a corrosive influence in the life of man. Discontent may goad man to improve his moral as well as his material status. Discontent, I believe, is an essential ingredient to progress. Every great invention had its origin in man's discontent with the power at his command, and his desire to find short cuts to human endeavors. Discontent with disease prodded man to discover serums and vaccines and to produce the wonder drugs of our age. Discontent with the duration of life upon this earth has lengthened the span of human existence. The discontent of people and of nations has catapulted us into the most revolutionary era in history.

Rosh Hashonah provides a divine, a moral channel for our discontent. It links us to the goals of the prophets of Israel, those great explorers of the human spirit, whose discontent with evil impelled them to teach mankind the way of justice and righteousness; whose hatred of war has given to the world their glorious vision of international disarmament and peace; whose passionate faith in God has kept alive the enduring prayer that the day will come "when all men will recognize that they are brethren so that, one in spirit and one in fellowship, they may be forever united" in their hope for brotherhood and peace.

While the faithful believe that these prophetic promises will eventually be fulfilled, the impatient and the discontented people of the world are being lured by grandiose blueprints of a New Utopia. National leaders and intellectuals of world stature have published goals for the future through which they seek to gain adherents in all parts of the world. The most dramatic appeal to those who are discontented with hunger, poverty, and exploitation is the new Communist manifesto, in which Khrushchev confidently proclaims that the day will come, not in the distant future, but within twenty years, when his system of government will provide free food, free shelter, and free transportation to all.

Whether we give credence to his boastful claim that the personal needs of every individual will find fulfillment in his design for living, or whether we deem it effective propaganda intended to entice the discontented, or whether we accept the cynical conclusion that everything will be free but freedom, the roseate promises of Khrushchev have already accelerated the struggle to capture the hearts and minds of men. America has countered with its massive foreign aid program and with untold billions for the Alliance for Progress in South America.

These goals for the immediate future which promise so much to those who have so little, are for the time being over-shadowing the divine standard of values which we reaffirm on the New Year. Our Bible also has a blueprint for a better world. It is concerned with our material as well as with our spiritual needs. The requisites of Judaism are indeed ethical as Micah taught in his incomparable definition of religion, when he said: "It hath been told thee, O man, what the Lord doth require of thee: only to do justice, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with the Lord." Our bible, however, also contains the Deuteronomic promise that the just and the righteous will be rewarded with an abundance of food, with good health, and with freedom from fear and from want.

The goals of Judaism are not out of this world. They deal with the immediate as well as with the enduring needs of men. The rabbis of old accentuated the ethical, the moral lessons of Judaism, but they were realistic enough to acknowledge "En Kemach En Torah," where there is no bread, there will be no Torah. They knew that men who are hungry, weak, and disillusioned may not be responsive to the noblest teachings of religion. They understood the debilitating influences of poverty, malnutrition, and disease, and they sought to satisfy man's material needs as well as sustain him with the restorative influence of Torah.

But they never made the material goal an end in itself, and herein they differed from the Communist Manifesto and from the other new Utopias of our age. They ardently believed in the biblical teaching that "man liveth not by bread alone but by everything that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord." They considered the lessons of the Torah as essential for the sustenance of man as are the air we breathe, the food we eat, and the energizing rays of the sun. And John Steinbeck's latest book is in substantial agreement with this rabbinic thesis.

"The Winter Of Our Discontent" is, I believe, a dramatic commentary (I am tempted to say a modern Midrash) on the biblical text, "man liveth not by bread alone." His novel is a penetrating insight into the foibles of an age in which material expectations have become the goal rather than the means by which man can attain the better life. He excoriates the tendency in modern life to measure the worth of men and of nations by material rather than by moral standards of values, and he indicts the gross materialism of an era in which men are more concerned with attaining the outward symbols of success than they are with the inward need to advance the moral laws which have become the cornerstone of human existence.

Steinbeck conveys this message through his principal character, whose discontent with the circumstances of his life, impel him to forsake his scrupulous standard of honesty and his moral convictions for the glittering gloss of material success. The tragedy of the leading character in the book is a poignant portrayal of the moral decay of the individual who believes that he can live by bread alone. Steinbeck has of course created a fictional character but his literary creation is symbolic of the malaise of our day, of the willingness to use deception and intrigue as the key to success. "The Winter Of Our Discontent" is more than a satiric commentary on the loss of integrity in our world. It is also a timely appeal to the individual to subject himself to critical analysis, to reexamine the goals which he has set for himself and to reaffirm his humanity.

The need for moral discernment and for self-improvement, which is characteristic of the message of Rosh Hashonah, is reflected in Steinbeck's unsparing attack upon our civilization and the decline in standards of personal, business, and political morality. Steinbeck in his novel probes the conscience of man and convincingly reveals the need to re-examine (as we do during this season of repentance) the means through which the better life can be attained. In his framework of reference "The Winter Of Our Discontent" may be considered an eloquent and timely Rosh Hashonah sermon to western civilization, a plea to all men to experience the regenerative power of self-examination.

Steinbeck develops the theme that each man needs a place for quiet meditation and contemplation, a place where he can take stock of himself, and gain the strength and the courage to abide by his convictions. Although Steinbeck makes no reference to Jews or Judaism in his book, I see in this idea a relevant analogy to the Jewish New Year. Each man must satisfy his hunger for the higher life. Each man needs a sanctuary wherein he can give expression to his inmost longings.

For the Jew, this place is the synagogue in which he communes with the Most High. Each man at some time or other feels the pressure of discontent within him, and yearns to reach out towards a Power higher than himself. The Jew finds his place in the synagogue during this High Holy Day season. During this season of our discontent, we take spiritual inventory of our lives, and seek the restorative influence of our religion. Each man needs a personal goal, an enduring vision which he strives to fulfill. The goal of Rosh Hashonah is self-improvement and the creation of a better life. Self-improvement and the creation of a better life, this is the goal which Steinbeck reveals to a society that has enough "Kemach", but not enough "Torah", to an affluent society that has an abundance of material resources but which is impoverished in spirit.

We may well ask during this season whether our desire for "Kemach" supersedes our love for Torah. Our prayers during these holy days bind us to the prophetic vision of a better world. We will soon assemble in our synagogues to reaffirm our faith in God and our hope for man. We will see in our prophetic heritage the enduring guide for the attainment of a better life. The divine insights of this season will help us to distinguish between a better life and material success.

The lessons of this season should inspire us to use the resources at our command as a means toward a higher goal, rather than as an end in itself. During this season when we ask to be inscribed in the Book of Life for a Happy New Year, we should be as concerned with the quality of our lives during the coming year, as we are with the quantity of our material goods. We should use the divine blessings with which we are so abundantly endowed as the means to advance the biblical blueprint for a better tomorrow.

During this season of our discontent, our discontent with evil, with injustice, with hypocrisy, and sham should inspire us to become what we ought to be during the coming year. May the New Year provide us with the opportunities to think, to enjoy, and to be willing contributors to the great social purposes of our religion. May this Season of Discontent be the Season of Recommitment to the beliefs, the ethics, the goals, and the practices of Judaism.

Safeguarding The Family By Securing The Home Through The Lasting Values

BY THE HONOURABLE LESTER B. PEARSON, LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

The coming of a New Year is traditionally a time for reflection. But it must also be, if we are to achieve a properly balanced perspective, a time for consideration of the future. Every turning of the calendar page underlines the passage of time. And so swift is time in its flight that, in our efforts to keep pace with it, we tend often to overlook some of those most important things in life: duty to the community, duty to neighbors, duty to those less fortunate than ourselves; even duty to family.

The tempo of our time, rapid and turbulent as it is, may help explain certain of the misfortunes which descend on the individual and the community; for tempo all too frequently means tension, and tension is at the root of so much of our trouble, international and national as well as domestic.

All well being, all progress in the community finds its source in the individual man and woman. This we may be inclined to lose sight of as governmental and state authority increasingly intervene in our private lives. But the individual cannot, and should never be, isolated from the cornerstone of healthy community life, the family. Because of the essential role it plays in the life of the community and, by extension, in the life of the nation, the family must be jealously safeguarded.

I, for my part, am able to look back over the years on a happy and secure home life, rich in everything except, perhaps, money. This, together with what I hope is pardonable pride in my own children and grandchildren, has given me a developed appreciation of family values. Individuals, after all, are the products of their environment, and the home is the strongest environmental factor of all.

This age of advanced technology and change in which we live only serves to heighten the necessity for sending out from our homes strong, well-adjusted individuals. It is not an over-simplification to say that in the hands of our youth rests the future of our country.

It is for this very good reason that I take pleasure in saluting those traditional hallmarks of Jewish home life, honour for parents, respect for learning, and an abundance of love. These are the elements that help create, shape, and maintain the most desirable kind of home atmosphere. The close knit family is one which shares its joys and sorrows; respect for parents gives birth naturally to respect for the laws of society and the land; while the early inculcation of respect for learning encourages the individual to properly prepare himself for service to his community and his country.

It is our responsibility as adults to guide our children, to make available to them the material and, even more important, the spiritual, resources that will enable them to find their way in an era of hydrogen and hate and fear. Our free society rests on the individual and not on the state. So we must reject the unhealthy and defeating doctrine that everything can, or should be, left to the government.

The more we do for ourselves, the more we accomplish by voluntary effort in our homes and communities, the less we need to rely on government. Then, and only then, we will be able to develop that which is required in this age; namely, the welfare society, a far better and deeper concept than the welfare state.

And so I urge my friends of the Jewish faith to continue to honour your ancient heritage by securing the home as a bastion of love and understanding and strength. For these are the lasting values that will enable you to look forward to this New Year and the new years to come with a reasonable hope that you and yours will know the peace and happiness for which men yearn.

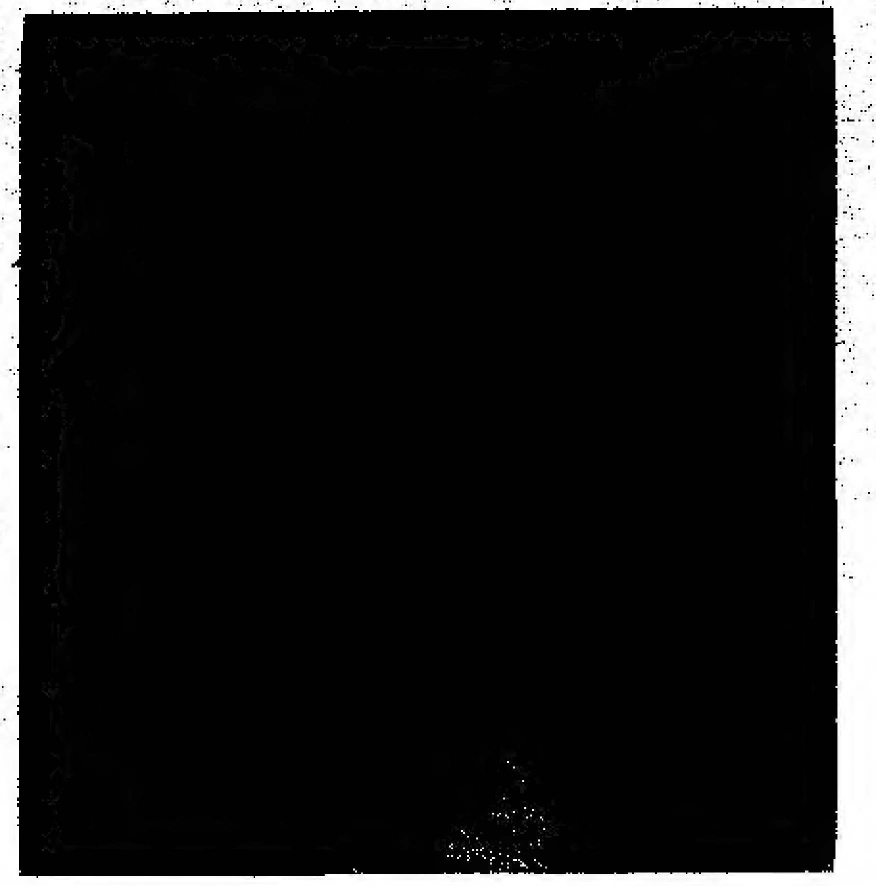
Louis Rasminsky, aged fifty-three years, the new Governor of the Bank of Canada through his promotion from a Deputy Governor, and his country's leading authority on international finance, is the first Jew to head a bank in Canada, and the first Jew to reach such a high public office in this country. Next to Donald Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways, whose salary is $75,000, the Governor of the Bank of Canada is second highest in the Public Service with $50,000. In 1954 Mr. Rasminsky was considered a strong candidate for the post. The New York Times says that "many persons expected Mr. Rasminsky to be appointed Governor. It was believed at the time that he was passed over because he was Jewish. With this appointment Mr. Rasminsky has reached the highest government position ever held by a Jew in Canada". Christopher Young, of Southam News Services, says in the Ottawa Citizen: "In Ottawa, there is also a very widespread feeling of gratification about the appointment because of the new Governor's Jewish origin. There is a collective guilt feeling that Jews have not always been given an even break in the government service and that Mr. Rasminsky himself has suffered from a prejudice . . . Mr. Rasminsky's experience and mastery of international finance will help the Bank of Canada to regain its standing in the money markets of the world. . . . The new governor is respected for his brilliance as an economist; but even more deeply he is held in affection as a wise and considerate colleague." Mr. Rasminsky automatically became president of the Industrial Development Bank concurrently with his appointment as Governor of the Bank of Canada, succeeding James E. Coyne, who was the second to be Governor. Born in Montreal, he moved to Toronto where he graduated from Harbord Collegiate and won three scholarships. At the University of Toronto he took a Bachelor of Arts degree in economics with honors in 1928. Then with a fellowship in political science he did post-graduate work at the London School of Economics. He was a member of the financial secretariat of the League of Nations from 1930 to 1939, and became the League's specialist on monetary and financial issues. He edited "World Monetary Review," and "Commercial Banks," was secretary and member of a number of committees set up by the League. In 1940 Mr. Rasminsky joined the Bank of Canada, and at the request of Graham Towers, the first Governor of the Bank of Canada, organized the economic and statistical section of the Foreign Exchange Control Board. He was named assistant to the chairman of the board in 1941, alternate chairman in 1942, executive assistant to the Governor of the Bank of Canada in 1943, and a Deputy Governor in 1955. He has supervised the Foreign Exchange Fund since 1950. Mr. Rasminsky represented Canada on delegations at San Francisco in 1945 and the UN Assembly in 1947. At the Bretton Woods conference in 1944 he was appointed chairman of the International Monetary Fund drafting committee and has represented Canada on the IMF board since its inception in 1946. He has been executive director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (the World Bank) since 1950. He has attended numerous Commonwealth and many international conferences on economic, financial and trade matters. He is a CBE, (1946); honorary LL.D, University of Toronto, (1953); and Fellow of the London School of Economics, (1959). Mr. Rasminsky is married to the former Miss Lyla Rotenberg, of Toronto, the daughter of the late Harry Rotenberg, and of Mrs. David Dunkelman, of Toronto. They live in Rockcliffe Park, in Ottawa. Their son, Michael Rasminsky, aged twenty-four years, graduated from Lisgar Collegiate; and the University of Toronto, in 1959, with prizes and scholarships, in Physics and Chemistry. He did a year's research work in microbiology at the Ontario Cancer Institute, and after gaining a Frank Knox Fellowship has completed the first of four years in Harvard University Medical School. He plans to make scientific research in medicine his life career. His folk opera, "Katy Cruel", was produced at the University of Toronto. Their daughter, Miss Lois Rasminsky, aged seventeen years, graduated from Lisgar Collegiate this year; plans to enter the Arts Faculty at Carleton University; and probably later will take a year at the University of Toronto.



Michael, aged twenty-four years, and Miss Lois Rasminsky, aged seventeen years, are the children of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Rasminsky.

"I've sure smoked some funny kinds of cigars, too. Little black, wicked cheroots . . . the big, two-handed Churchills . . . all kinds, shapes and all prices, too!"

"Back to your question . . . I guess I would say that a good cigar must have a good aroma . . . a good flavour . . . must burn slowly, evenly . . . have a solid white ash . . ."

"Seems fairly obvious I suppose . . . but it's surprising how few cigars live up to that."

Arnold Hart, president of the Bank of Montreal, telling him that the National Centennial Scholarship Plan had recommended him for one of the sixteen scholarships which the Bank awarded to the most outstanding of the forty-eight students across Canada who participated in first-year collegiate studies under the Plan in 1960-61. MONTREAL SYNAGOGUE FEATURES CONCRETE FOLDED PLATE ROOF

Structure: ADATH JESHURUN HADRATH KODESH SYNAGOGUE, MONTREAL Architects: MAYERS & GIRVAN
Consulting Engineer: BERNARD GELLER General Contractor: LOUIS DONOLO INC.

Among the new types of concrete roofs developed in recent years, the folded plate design is probably the most spectacular.

Folded plate shell roofs are noted for their fine appearance and their spanning and load carrying capabilities. In hangar construction they have been used to accommodate the great wingspans of jet aircraft. Their ability to cantilever has also been capitalized upon in churches, schools, stores, sports centers, and industrial buildings.

Despite their spectacular beauty, concrete folded plate roofs prove to be the most economical means of roofing buildings. Simplified design procedures and improved forming techniques have made them highly competitive with other roof systems long thought to be lowest in cost.

When the shofar sounds

In the days of the shepherds on the slopes of Sinai, the ram's horn called the sheep back to the flock.
Today as Jews everywhere turn back to a contemplation of the age-old truths first proclaimed by the prophets and then given to the world, we join with them in the greeting that they be
"inscribed for a New Year"... a year of health, happiness and prosperity.

Where Trend Meets Tradition

Over the years we have developed a close and lasting association with suppliers from abroad. Through working and exchanging visits with them, we have been constantly aware of international styles and trends.

Now in the jet age we are only blocks away from the clothing capitols of the world, the source of trends and the home of tradition.

To provide fine clothing requires the thoughtful adapting and blending of both. Our fall and winter display of materials and models, both exclusively our own, reflect how well and carefully we have prepared for the coming seasons. We hope that you will accept this as an invitation to come and see them for yourself.

It is being done every day, using INVESTORS retirement services. There are three basic plans, each of which can be registered for tax exemption. The first is an absolutely guaranteed fixed-interest plan, solid as bedrock. The second plan is a managed selection of high-grade securities — promising as the future of Canada. The third is a combination of the first and second — of bedrock and long-term growth. May we tell you more about these INVESTORS retirement services?

"Mikado Pattern"

This Japanese style of design was first produced in the late nineteenth century from original sketches by our own designer. Japanese and Chinese art are closely related and invariably depict mythological subjects, including the bamboo, pine and peach trees, signifying longevity, and these are a feature of the "Mikado" pattern. It will be observed that varied scenes appear on different pieces, which adds to the interest of the design. The special tint of blue, which is beautifully soft and pleasing, combined with the pure luscious body of Royal Crown Derby China, make this design outstanding from all others.

In This, The Season Of The Settling Of Accounts

BY CANTOR BEZALEL SILBERBERG, OF SHAAREI ZEDEK SYNAGOGUE, SAINT JOHN, N. B.

As the season of the High Holidays approaches, many within the Hebrew community begin to give thought to their future, setting as the aim the means for squaring their accounts with God, so as to assure renewal of life and blessing of purpose for themselves. This season is popularly known as the season of the searching of the soul, for much was done during the past year, where no regard was given as to consequences concerning any good or evil act committed by the individual, who now, hit by the impact of conscience, finally begins to realize the time of judgment drawing near, so that he makes every attempt to prove himself worthy, to be renewed and blessed for another year.

We are also reminded of this season as being the time when the anniversary of the Creation is observed and celebrated, for on this day tradition bases the fact of the Creation of the Universe out of nothing into matter and form. The importance of our having to settle our account is obvious as we stand at the threshold of a new time, thereby assuring us of a good future, or condemning us for having been flagrant and violate of human principle. The notable example of Abraham, being commanded by God to take Isaac to Mount Moriah and there offer him as a sacrifice is one which teaches us a great moral value. We must give heed to whatever act we are about to commit, for we, as the children of God, are endowed with the awareness of right and wrong. We are therefore obliged to weigh carefully, that which we are about to enact so as to prevent ourselves from being entrapped in moral difficulty.

The idea of the ram being trapped just as Abraham was to sacrifice Isaac signifies God's desire to test Abraham's fitness for becoming the founder of our faith, and to reveal to Abraham how much God was opposed to the taking of human life in order to prove his loyalty. The lesson reveals that there are substitutions and these substitutions may be readily found, if the individual will give careful attention to it.

From the standpoint of tradition, we are bidden to reawaken ourselves, through the blowing of the Shofar during the month of Elul, which immediately precedes the season of the High Holidays. The Shofar reminds us to gather together our accounts so as to place them before God's Throne in order for Him to record them into the Book of Life, after which He judges our worth, and finally seals the accounting.

Consistent wrong-doing is not negated by one act of righteousness, nor are we able to be consistent in the performance of righteous deeds although, as the example of the attempted sacrifice of Isaac reveals, there are ways and means for us to find substitutes for what would be considered a right and wrong deed. We are bound by a morality that is easy to follow, were we to afford it stricter attention. This is the core of the Judaic way of life, and it is up to us to follow it as closely as is possible. The smallest act, as well as the greatest, ascends to the Throne of Judgment, is weighed and sealed, and from it, we may then learn how our future is to be affected.

At a time when the judges of Eichmann's trial ponder his fate, it is our duty to pray for them to judge rightly. Eichmann's wrongdoing certainly offended God, but the judges, weighing his fate, by a wrong decision can certainly bring us to severe judgment as a nation. "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth", states the Bible, but from that statement can be gleaned the fact of vengeance belonging to God alone. We have the right to judge a murderer or thief, but we have no right to wreak vengeance, according to the sense that is conveyed to us through the Bible. Eichmann committed crimes that offended God as well as humanity, but the sins he knowingly committed are within God's knowledge and rest upon his conscience. Retribution in this case, can be wrought only by God.

The idea of the celebration of the Creation also serves us as a reminder of our obligation to create and re-create. Morally, we must re-create ourselves in the eyes of God in order for us to win His grace and blessing. We are obliged to purge ourselves of evildoing, and make a sincere effort to better ourselves in every way so as to become blessed.

The message of reawakening then, should, at all times of the year, make us ponder every move we set out to make. It might mean nothing and it might mean very

Greetings from the Loyalist Port City of Saint John

NEW BRUNSWICK

The Industrial Centre of the Maritimes!

Not only is Saint John the industrial centre of Canada's Eastern Provinces — here too a great new industrial growth marks a new era of development and progress. Here also — Canada's "Loyalist City" affords the visitor an intriguing journey into the past. The city and district has for many years been a prime vacation area that affords all of the opportunities for a memorable holiday. Whether business or pleasure calls you "down east" — plan to spend a day or more in Saint John!

much. Reawakening is not only confined to our mode of action, but to the matter of attention and consideration given the action. A further message of reawakening concerns our deeds toward our fellow-men. We are obliged to be our brother's keeper, we are obliged to make life on this earth tolerable, if not pleasant, for each other. The moral of it all is that whatever we do, reveals itself to God, and in the end, is judged by God who metes out blessing or doom.

The idea of atonement is for us to be sincere with ourselves as well as with God. We cannot, nor have we the right, to take God's place. Therefore, we must discipline ourselves in our actions and deeds. Atonement is closely connected with Abraham's intended sacrifice of Isaac in that we are taught there are many ways and means at our disposal in our dealing with a problem.

One other reminder is the prayer beginning with the words, "On the New Year", in which is recited our various fates. It is a concise statement of what our future can become as a result of the good and evil acts we have committed. Through the sage counselling of the statement at its end, advises us that by certain acts which are good in the eyes of God we may avoid condemnation.

This statement is quite literal, for only through acts of goodness can we attain to definite renewal in the eyes of God. Only through declaring ourselves our brothers' keepers, may we find that which God deems as being blessed. Only through prayer, and not only at times of ordeal, can we attain to righteousness, and only through real charity, can we expect honor and reward. We stand at the threshold of a new future. We come to be judged for our past deeds, so that the entire accounting may balance in our favor and we may be given a new opportunity for redemption in the time to come.

In the observance of the anniversary of Creation, we must fulfill God's desire for us to raise our personal stature in His eyes. In the light of the lesson of Abraham's sacrifice, we must make it our duty to avoid deeds and actions which we would have reason to regret. It is our duty to learn anew the way that lies before us, and to work and discipline our ways so as to win God's forgiveness and His blessing of renewal of life.

S., to Harold Cohen, son of Mr. and Mrs. Sol Cohen, of Leeds, England, took place at Beth Israel Synagogue, on Tuesday, June 27. Rabbi Herbert C. Dobrinsky officiated. The bride was given in marriage by her parents. She wore a white, brocaded gown, fashioned with a curved neckline, and long sleeves. The bodice was enhanced by a back bow, trimmed with self-material roses. The bouffant skirt had a slight train. Her four-tier, chapel-length veil was fastened to a tiara of seed-pearl-beads and she carried a cascade bouquet of white carnations and lilies-of-the-valley. Miss Sandra Novack was maid of honour for her sister. Misses Renee Devlin, of Toronto, Ont.; Sarah Weigensberg, of Montreal, Que., cousin of the bride; and Lydia Gallay were bridesmaids. Deborah Ann Merovitch, cousin of the bride was junior bridesmaid. Miss Novack was in a mauve, silk organza gown over taffeta, fashioned with pleats at the bodice. The bridesmaids and junior bridesmaid wore mauve gowns, fashioned with Chantilly lace bodices; and silk organza skirts over taffeta; with cummerbunds which were tied as bows at the back. They carried nosegays of white roses and carnations entwined with mauve ribbons. Herbert Horwich was best man. The ushers were Jerry Blumenthal, Gordon Dankner, and Leon Zelikovitz. Jack Novack, brother of the bride was junior usher. Mark Allan Sadofsky, cousin of the bride, was page boy. The Synagogue was decorated with baskets of mixed flowers. Mrs. Novack, mother of the bride, was in a champagne-coloured, silk organza sheath, over brown peau de soie. Her hat was brown, fashioned with petals of silk organza and peau de soie; and she had a corsage of yellow roses. Mrs. Cohen, the groom's mother, was in a salmon-coloured, crepe sheath, trimmed with lace. Her hat was fashioned with white and pink roses; and she had a corsage of pink roses. The Role Of Law In International Affairs As Illustrated By The Eichmann Case

BY PROFESSOR MILTON KATZ, OF NEWARK, N.J., AUTHORITY ON INTERNATIONAL LAW, WHO WAS CHIEF OF THE MARSHALL PLAN WITH THE RANK OF AMBASSADOR. THIS PAPER WAS DELIVERED AS THE EDWIN C. CAFFREY MEMORIAL LECTURE, SPONSORED BY THE NEW JERSEY INSTITUTE FOR PRACTICING LAWYERS, AND IS REPRINTED FROM THE NEW JERSEY LAW JOURNAL.

As I understand it, the subject of this discourse has been presented to you as the Eichmann case. Now, let me say right at the outset that the Eichmann case is packed full of emotion, drama and political and historical significance. In my view, it also happens to be interesting and to have long-range significance from the point of view of law. I believe it is significant from the point of view of law in a double sense.

On the one hand, as I shall try to show, it has implications for one of the larger problems which confront the world today: how far and in what way can disputes between nations be resolved through law?

In another aspect, it also has considerable significance for law as law presents itself to practicing lawyers; law in the sense of the daily work of lawyers and judges.

With your permission, in the few words I will say to you, I should like to avoid any discussion of the Eichmann case in the political sense or in the dramatic sense or in the emotional sense. I'll confine myself to the Eichmann case in the legal sense, because we are met here under the auspices of the Practicing Law Institute and because I think that perhaps in the long run some of the legal implications of the case may prove to be no less enduring and possibly more enduring than some of the others.

I would like to begin very briefly by reminding you of the facts of the case. They are not very numerous nor very complicated. About six months ago, we all read in the newspapers that a man named Eichmann had been transferred — and I use the word "transferred" because I am trying to be as neutral as possible — had been transferred from Argentina to Israel where he is going to be tried under an Israeli statute to which I will return in a moment.

Now, the Argentine Government contended that officers and agents of the Government of Israel had entered Argentina, had kidnapped Eichmann and by force had transferred him across the sea to Israel.

There was another story which also appeared in the press at that time. I myself am not clear how far the Government of Israel tried to attach itself to the second story. At any rate, the second story was that a group of volunteers who had dedicated themselves to tracking down and pursuing to the uttermost ends of the earth, as the old civil law phrase goes, the perpetrators of some of the crimes during the Hitler period in Germany, had found that Eichmann had found an incognito refuge in Argentina; they had gone to Argentina as volunteers; they had spoken with him and persuaded him voluntarily to board an airplane and to go back to Israel with them.

If the second of the versions should be accurate, many of the problems which I will discuss with you would not be involved in the case. For that reason, that is, because we want to be able to discuss all the problems, I am going to assume that the first version of the story is accurate; namely, that these men were officers and agents of Israel and that they had kidnapped Eichmann. In the later negotiations which the Government of Israel conducted with Argentina, I find very little evidence that they were insisting on the second version. It would seem fair to assume, at least for the sake of discussion, that the first version was accurate, that he had been kidnapped and had been transported by force into the airplane and across to Israel.

Those in outline are the essential facts of the case. He is going to be prosecuted under a statute which was passed in Israel a few years ago, 1950, passed after the time in which the crimes which most people assume that Eichmann committed, took place. The statute is in three parts. It deals with three groups of crimes as defined by that statute.

One is the category of so-called crimes against the Jewish people. The second is the category of war crimes. The third is the category of crimes against humanity.

Now, I shall confine myself for all practical purposes to categories two and three. That is to say, to that part of the prosecution which will charge Eichmann with having been guilty of war crimes and that part of the prosecution which will charge Eichmann with having been guilty of crimes against humanity. I shall do so not because the part of the statute which charges him with crimes against the Jewish people is insignificant, unimportant, or not worthy of our attention. Indeed, it has in addition to its immediate dramatic and political significance, a more general significance to which I will refer later on in any remarks.

But I want to concentrate upon those two paragraphs of the statute which deal with crimes against humanity and with war crimes, because I believe that the problems raised by this paragraph might have arisen, could arise and may yet arise in another context. That is, these problems could have arisen if, for instance, the nation which had kidnapped Eichmann and brought him to trial had been Sweden or Denmark or Holland, Norway, Poland, or any other state. In short, the specific relationship of Eichmann to the Jewish people is not an indispensable part of this case in the legal sense, although it is, of course, a vital part of it in the actual and historical sense.

The only other fact to which I will refer is one with which you are familiar. Eichmann apparently was charged by Hitler with special responsibility for attempting to exterminate the Jewish people in Europe, and he is generally believed, according to the testimony at the Nuremberg trials and according to the findings of various Foreign Offices, to have been responsible for the killing, the murder of close to six million people, in Germany, Poland, The Netherlands, France, Denmark, Norway, Czechoslovakia, principally.

Those are the facts.

Now, those facts raise three different groups of legal problems which I am going to try to sort out for you. They have to be dealt with separately to be comprehensible and especially if their significance is to be appreciated.

The first group of problems has to do with the complaint of Argentina against Israel. Argentina's complaint in brief was that Israel in capturing, kidnapping a man who was present within Argentina, and taking him out of Argentina to Israel, had violated the law of Argentina and had also violated international law. The first group of problems revolves around that charge.

There is a second group of problems which I want to skip for the moment, because it represents something intermediate between the first and third.

The third group of problems is something which will perhaps strike the lawyers in this audience —its significance will strike the lawyers in this audience — I think more readily than the laymen, although I think the laymen will appreciate it. It has to do with this question: What is the proper reach of the legal system of any country? How far may the legislation of one country extend beyond its own borders and beyond its own nationals? The crimes for which Israel will charge Eichmann were crimes committed by him outside of Israel, in the countries which I named a moment ago. There is, therefore, as the lawyers say, no obvious territorial basis for the extension to this activity of Israeli statutes. Eichmann was not a national of Israel, so that they were not purporting to punish one of their own nationals.

The question therefore arises, may any state — Israel or the United States or England or Japan or India — pass statutes which purport to regulate, to govern the conduct of people outside the borders of that state who are not nationals of that state?

As I shall show you later when I analyze these groups of problems in somewhat greater detail, this is a problem which arises today fairly frequently under the statutes of many states. In the case of the United States, such problems arise particularly because of certain statutes, notably the anti-trust laws and our labor legislation. Such problems arise also because of the operation of the tax statutes of many countries. Lawyers are going to have to cope with problems of this sort in increasing measure, I believe, simply because the world is the kind of world which it has become.

In between the first and third group, is the second group of problems which Eichmann may raise in the courts of Israel, in the first instance, and thereafter perhaps before other tribunals, possibly international tribunals. This group might be described in essence as revolving around this question: What right do you have to try me when you got jurisdiction over me by kidnapping? I was not in this state. You didn't arrest me here. You didn't find me here. You didn't serve me here. I didn't come here voluntarily. You captured me and brought me here by force. I charge that you cannot get jurisdiction over my person in that way.

I would mention one other feature which perhaps can be best put into the third group, and that is the apparent retroactivity of the Israeli legislation. The statute of Israel, as I told you, was passed in 1950, and Eichmann's deeds were done, as far as one can tell, during the period which ended in 1945, after which he fled, disappeared from sight, and was eventually tracked down, found in Argentina, under an assumed name and indeed with an assumed face. (He had surgery done on his face to conceal his identity.)

These are the three groups of problems. Before I analyze them, I would like to indicate to you why I think these problems have a broad gauge and long range significance over and above the inherent drama with which this whole thing is packed. Let me turn to the first group and suggest to you what its broad gauge and long range significance may be.

Argentina charges Israel with a violation of its borders, a violation of its law, and with the assertion within Argentina of Israeli governmental authority. They say: When your agents and officers under your direction or at least with your acquiescence and consent or ratification, purported to arrest a man in Argentina, you were purporting to exercise governmental power within Argentina, because only a government has the right of arrest; and when you try to exercise governmental power within Argentina you are violating not only the borders of Argentina and not only the law of Argentina, but also the sovereignty of Argentina.

You have read about the U-2 case, in which the Soviet Union charged that the United States had violated its borders, and by flying aircraft under U. S. command over Russia, has purported to exercise United States sovereign rights within the territory of Russia. That question was complicated by a question concerning the territorial status of air space over Russia. But it isn't just the U-2 case I am thinking of when I suggest to you that this has tremendous significance. The underlying question which these examples illustrate is this: What happens when a state violates international law with respect to another state in the modern world?

Both Argentina and Israel are members of the United Nations, as are most other states in the world today. Under the UN charters and certain other multilateral treaties, no state may use armed force to vindicate its asserted rights except in self-defense against the armed attack of another state. If, therefore, Argentina wanted redress from Israel, since she is prohibited from going to war about this violation of her borders, the alleged violation of her borders, the alleged violation of her sovereignty, is there anything in the society of this world which affords her a remedy other than war?

Now, you will, I think, recognize quite quickly at least four or five situations which have arisen within the past five years which are similar in that respect. In 1956, Egypt was felt by Britain and by France and by Israel to have violated their rights in several fundamental ways, the most conspicuous of which was the seizure of the Suez Canal, but including also blockades in the Suez Canal, border raids into Israel, the stirring up of trouble in Cyprus, the stirring up of trouble in Algeria, the seizure of British business in Egypt, the systematic use of radio, television and other forms of mass propaganda to stir up hatred against Britain, France, Israel, to vilify them, destroy their good name. They resorted to the old-fashioned remedy war and the result was a tremendous uproar. As you will recall, the United States was in the forefront of those who said this is a violation of the United Nations Charter, we will not permit you to do this; and eventually the pressure was strong enough so that Britain and France and Israel withdrew.

That incident, however, left open the question which I opened for you before. Suppose that Britain and France and Israel had come to the United Nations and had said: Look what Nasser is doing to us. In the nineteenth century, we would have gone in and knocked his block off. Today war is prohibited except in self-defense against armed attack. We can't lawfully resort to war. Does this mean we have to sit and take it? Is there no remedy at all? If by the United Nations Charter, war has been outlawed except in self-defense, will that outlawing of war last, can it last, if some system of remedies other than the remedy through war is not provided in its place?

I don't have to remind you about

Cuba. Castro has done act after act after act which many responsible lawyers believe to be clearly in violation of international law, in violation of the rights of the United States and American nationals. Does the United States have any remedy? Can it find any remedy short of going in with troops, which would be a violation of the United Nations Charter, and, of course, run profoundly counter to the principles and desires of the American people?

Not so long ago, you may recall, the Government of Venezuela charged that the Dominican Republic, the Trujillo regime, had undertaken to arrange for the assassination of the President of Venezuela. At the Sixth Conference of the Foreign Ministers of the American States, Venezuela demanded satisfaction. The Conference of Foreign Ministers of the American States passed a resolution condemning Trujillo and his regime, and agreed to adopt certain measures in the way of social ostracism and some economic pressure against that regime. Venezuela considered that acceptable for the time being. But again it raised the question: If these nations are not to be permitted to resort to war, what remedy do the legal systems of the world afford them?

Here in Newark, suppose that we were to abolish the law of torts and the criminal law and the law of contract. If, then, someone ran you down on the street negligently and broke your leg, or trespassed on your land, or burnt your house, or stole your money, or vilified your name by repeated libels in the press and over the radio, or bumped into you on the street and knocked you down, or broke contracts with you, or stole your property you would have no legal remedy. Suppose, also, you were told you couldn't shoot except in self-defense against armed attack. How long would this last? How long would it be before all of you in Newark would go back to the ways of the old wild west, and begin toting sidearms?

I think it is quite basic, so elementary that most of us overlook it, that if you prohibit force, you can only do so if you replace it with law. And this is the first great question which was raised by the Eichmann case in one of its aspects.

Now, I will say to you without trying to document it, because it seems fairly clear, that Israel's conduct as against Argentina was a violation of international law as well as a violation of Argentine law. Argentina had a valid claim against Israel under international law. She might have brought that claim, she might have tried to assert it in the International Court of Justice. She chose instead to proceed politically before the Security Council of the United Nations. As you know, the Security Council issued a finding to the effect that the conduct of Israel did cause a danger to international peace and security and requested Israel to give reparations, appropriate reparations, to Argentina.

As you also know, Argentina and Israel have now treated it as a closed incident. Argentina accepted the Israeli apologies and certain other steps as adequate reparations, and the matter stands closed. It is closed, however, only because Israel was prepared to acknowledge that she had violated international law, and was prepared to offer reparations; and only because Argentina was ready to accept the relatively mild reparations which were offered. They were essentially apologies, recognitions that Argentina's sovereignty had been infringed, also reaffirmations of Argentina's rights, and a few other things.

This was possible because one takes it that the Argentine Government really was not frightfully concerned about the particular individual, and was concerned primarily to vindicate its own position under international law. That phase of the case, therefore, is, for practical purposes, closed, but I mention it to you to remind you that this sort of thing which happened there, which happened in Cuba, Venezuela, the Dominican Republic, the Suez Canal, and right now in the Belgian Congo, raises for us a question to which we are going to have to find an answer.

If people, as I say, injure you in any way that falls short of armed attack, are you without an effective remedy? Under public international law in its present stage of development, and under the U.N. Charter, as presently construed and applied, remedies are not available, except within very narrow limits.

Now, let me carry you over to the significance of the third set of problems, the questions relat-of the disastrous consequences which will befall an aggressor.

In these days there is no room for neutralism. It is not a time for separating ourselves from our partners. Canada's policy is to work in concert with its friends and allies for the preservation of peace and security in freedom. This policy is soundly based on Canadian considerations, Canadian values, and Canadian interests, the greatest of which, apart from freedom itself, is peace.

At the United Nations last September Mr. Khrushchev dealt with colonialism. He condemned foreign yokes and colonial bondage, conveniently forgetting that the U.S.S.R. is the greatest colonial power in the world today. Mr. Khrushchev at the United Nations used these words:

"It has been and always will be our stand that the peoples of Africa, like those of other continents striving for their liberation from the colonial yoke, should establish order in their countries of their own will and choice . . ." Mr. Khrushchev stated later: "Complete and final elimination of the colonial regime in all its forms and manifestations has been prompted by the entire course of the world history in the last decades . . ."

How does he apply that to the Ukraine? And to Hungary, Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania and other countries under Soviet domination? Why does he deny them free choice to determine the kind of governments they have the right to ask for?

He should be constantly reminded of these statements he made at the United Nations, that subjugated nations should have the right to achieve their destiny by their own will and choice. I say to Mr. Khrushchev, give the Ukraine and the other subjugated countries the right to free elections to determine the kind of government the people desire.

Since 1945 many of the nations that are now independent autonomous nations and members of the United Nations were formerly colonies of either the United Kingdom or France, and since the war fourteen colonies, protectorates, and the like, comprising five hundred million people within the Commonwealth, have achieved independence, as have seventeen colonial areas been given their freedom by the Republic of France.

None of the post-war colonies of the U.S.S.R. has been freed. Hungary tried to be.

The latest example of Soviet obstruction occurred when the Soviet Union, in the Security Council, by means of its veto, prevented the adoption of a British resolution that the United Nations Security Council should guarantee the independence of Kuwait. The U.S.S.R., the leading agent of colonial subjugation in the modern world, continues to pose as the advocate and champion of the emerging peoples of Asia, Africa, and Latin America. In this way the Communists extend their influence and domination.

THE SHOFAR'S BLAST: A CALL FOR SELF-APPRAISAL

end consign them to a share of hallowed earth.

The influx of refugees before and after World War II, and the holocaust of European Jewry (however unfortunate and unprecedented it was in the history of mankind), was a boon as far as enriching the spiritual and cultural life of the Jews on this continent was concerned. It awoke the Jewish conscience to seek a more profound Jewish identity. The Land of Israel could no more belong to a dream. It was the living air of survival for the Jewish people. With the return to Zion and the seeking of a Jewish identity, came the beginning of a "return to religion".

The High Holy Day Prayers afford an excellent opportunity to reawake us, to begin to salvage the spiritual life of every one. Through the dynamic tool of a personal, spiritual psychoanalysis, we can understand our attitudes and conceptions, which are for many both incorrect and too often a painful inner struggle. In psychological terms, the history of almost a half of a century created within our people a "separation anxiety". The economic social trials and pressures of North American life gave stimuli to the innate forces of man to rid himself of all unpleasantries.

Man's nature is to remember, repeat, and seek such components of past experiences which rendered him maximum emotional satisfaction and are accepted by society. The general definition of anxiety is accepted as "the will for the present and future to become part of the past" as often heard, "get going", "get it over with". Considering the collective experiences and history of the Jew as we have already mentioned, there is highly prevalent an added factor in the anxiety complex, the anxiety for the past to remain in the past and be forgotten. However unjustified and unfair, the stigma of economic, social, and traditional difficulties of days gone by for many have all been fused into one unit, and therefore usually, the need is to forget them in that state of unanimity. As Sigmund Freud stated: "The forgetting in all cases is proved to be found on a direct motive or indirect association with displeasure."

In all fairness to the responsibilities we all bear to the future Jewish spiritual life, can we venture to say our personal religious experiences and the unfathomable richness of our heritage are synonymous with suffering and displeasure? No! Then why this anxiety to separate, forget, and slowly cast aside this treasure through deviation and compromise? Many have too freely associated yesterday's distressing social and economic conditions as synonymous with a condemning faith, condemning the modern Jew to an illogical fantasy of a sacrificial Sabbath, a drudgery of an out-dated religious culture, rather than to face the true sense of fulfillment manifested by Jewish education, and the panoramic beauty of Jewish traditional life.

Those who have withdrawn from the past with an avid distaste for many social and economic conditions have included to some extent a dislike, unconscious fear, and lack of desire for traditional Judaism. Although we must admit that the Torah basically has never been the cause of these unpleasant feelings, yet it has unfortunately suffered an almost irreparable blow, the unjustified loss of many followers as a result of irrationalities.

Only if we clearly recognise the conscious and subconscious wish of man to forget an unpleasant past and the way this dynamic process unfairly overshadows the true picture of what has taken place, never stopping to discriminate between the pleasant and unpleasant, the good and the bad, can we hope for a genuine and thorough "return to religion." Man must stop and begin to analyse in order to arrest this "free association". Then he will fully realize that the treasures of Jewish traditions are spiritual honeys, palatable, refreshing, and modern, and above all, an emotional necessity. But, regrettably the spoon with which it was fed was too often corroded with oppression and flight, the rust of struggling immigration.

I can think of a no better or more opportune moment than the High Holy Day prayers to begin to psycho-analyse our impressions and attitudes towards modern Jewish life in the light of the present day. The Rosh Hashonah prayers are categorized as a trinity of "Malchiyos" (the declaration of the Lord's Kingdom); "Zichronos" (memories); and "Shoforos" (the call to awake). The portion of Zichronos recalls the memories of Jewish history to which we, the living, will be linked within the element of time. We must aspire to become an integral and important chapter of these memories, as we have nothing more important to leave to our children.

As we read the Holy Day prayers and think of the future year ahead, we readily see that nothing can begin, nor live, nor end successfully without the memories of the past. It is written in our Machzor: "Thou rememberest what was wrought from eternity and art mindful of all that has been formed from old. Before Thee secrets are revealed and the multitude of hidden things from the beginning; for there is no forgetfulness before the Throne of Thy Glory." Man has been created in the image of His Creator. If he is to make use of this cherished image, he, too, must function as his creator functions and remember his personal history. He must clearly analyse and thereby develop correct and healthy attitudes, and aspirations for his future. With this purpose in mind, prayer must be a means of recalling "hidden things from the beginning".

Philologically, there does not exist in the Hebrew language a pure nor original word for prayer. Through the mechanics of grammar, it originates from the word "Peelale" (to judge). "L'hispalale" (to pray) is the self-reflective action of judging oneself. Therefore, prayer is a golden opportunity to judge oneself, a clamoring call to self-analysis. The declaration of Jeremiah during our Holy Day prayers: "How Thou didst go after me into the wilderness, in a land that was not sown", may ring an important note and bring to light an oasis of material for the psycho-analysis of North American Jewry.

To reap the full benefit of the devotional prayers at this holiday time, man must include amongst his thoughts and requests for future health and happiness, a careful study of himself and years gone by. He will then gain from his own personal pleasant as well as distasteful experiences, guidance and truth, which will directly enhance his attitudes, prayers, and hopes for the future. The Shofar's blast is to awaken man in order that he should think, a call for self appraisal: "Wake up, Ye slumberers, who sleep."

Man indulges too often in the unchallenging sleep of "passivity". As shocking as it may seem, the collective conscience of man does not sleep. Its many irrational attitudes are very much alive and may endanger the rich heritage of Jewish life, its traditions, and commandments. "Happy are the people who perceive the Truah (Shofar's note); in the light of Thy countenance they conduct themselves."

We cannot afford to react to the Shofar's message as a passing musical shadow. It must penetrate the very depths of the Jewish conscience. Then and only then can we establish the Lord's Kingdom ("Malchiyos") in the world of today. You are the only real judge of yourself, and it is your responsibility to render with a supreme sense of pure justice a righteous judgment, for some one very dear to you and all of us: yourself.

TRAVELLERS' AID, THE "NEIGHBOUR AWAY FROM HOME"

existing facilities are inadequate. The Society shall be non-sectarian, non-political and non-commercial, and to the fullest possible extent shall be a community service in the community in which it operates.

As travel patterns change, Travellers' Aid has adapted its service to the needs of moving people. The traditional modes of travel were by rail and sea followed by the development of travel by bus. Auto ownership (a universal aspect of our American life) became extensive and brought its own problems and a marked contribution to "hitch hiking". Now air travel is challenging the resources of Travellers' Aid. Precisely the same problems are being presented at the airports as are found at other terminals. Somehow Travellers' Aid must find the financial backing to give the same good service to people who travel by air and are in trouble.

"Trouble" comes unannounced and is entirely unpredictable. Therefore Travellers' Aid maintains twenty-four-hour availability and daily coverage at the Canadian National Railroad and Canadian Pacific Railroad terminals from early morning until late at night in order to give individualized service including "crisis help" food, lodging, to people in acute distress, to provide emergency assistance until the clients' own resources can be mobilized or adequate planning be possible.

A unique aspect of Travellers' Aid service is the Travellers' Aid Chain of Service which requires centralized organization to maintain it. This is established through National Travellers' Aid Association, which recently held a three-day meeting of the sixteen Travellers' Aid Societies of Canada and the U. S. included in Region One of the Association, at the Sheraton Mount Royal Hotel, in Montreal. Headquarters is in New York.

The Travellers' Aid Society of Montreal has been represented on the Executive Council of the National Travellers' Aid Association by Mrs. M. Jean Henshaw, executive director, who came to Montreal on May 4, 1948, to join the staff of the Jewish Child Welfare Bureau. Through the national organization, uniform standards and methods of work can be maintained. Each agency is a link in the Chain, and although autonomous, must provide strength to the Chain.

Clearly, Travellers' Aid does not serve a specialized group of the population but serves people who have in common the fact that they are in trouble away from home, cut loose from their moorings, personal family, and community resources. Travellers' Aid is the "neighbour" away from home. This is of special interest to Montrealers in trouble in other parts of the world for the Home Town Study shows that up to 25,000 Montrealers in a single year have been helped by the Chain Service in other parts of the world.

Anyone can become a Travellers' Aid client. A picked-pocket, loss of a ticket, a car accident, illness, any misfortune can in a single moment convert a normally self-sufficient person into an anxious client of Travellers' Aid.

It is good to know that Travellers' Aid stands ready to give expert help, if needed, to travellers not only throughout this continent but also in cities of Australia, Asia, Great Britain, Europe, New Zealand, and South America.

Often the combined efforts of two or more societies are required to resolve the problem of only one of our clients. It is often necessary to invoke the appointment service of the Chain for the elderly, very young, handicapped, or inexperienced travellers. Travellers' Aid appointment service can be depended upon to help with travel planning (particularly when "border" crossings are involved), to place them en route, to meet, supervise, and help them during "stop overs" and, finally, to receive them at destination and see them safely "landed" or united with their sponsors or relatives.

Our funds for operation are secured through grants and subventions from transportation companies, Government Departments, and Federations, and organizations, one of which is the Canadian Jewish Congress. People will always claim the right to move freely and at will. Some will plan, some will not. Many will develop problems whether or not they plan. They will be the concern of Travellers' Aid which will continue to serve them.

"oneness of Allah", whereas the Hellenistic religious concept was marked through with polytheism.

Incidentally there were many of the Jewish cantors of Turkey who were influenced by the impressive works of the Turkish composer, Shikior Affandi. Many of the hymn melodies used by the Turkish cantors are taken from his compositions. Among his disciples can be included the Haham Isaac Algazy, chief rabbi and cantor of a sizable Sephardic community in Montevideo who is known in many countries through his recordings and his own compositions. His father, Shlomo Algazy, was one of the leading Sephardic cantors of his day.

In general, however, it should be stressed after a lengthy controversy among Jewish musicologists, the conclusion was reached that the true source and key to the foundations of Jewish music lay in the traditional melody of the Bible text. THE LIFE OF ENCOUNTER tivity into malaise and disease. By retreating from being-in-the-world, one cannot be for himself. Life withers, courage fails, dread arises, and joy is lost.

II

As each person matures he must learn, as it were, to wear the shoes of the various social roles life presents him. Only in infancy is the baby truly himself. The baby is; nothing else is expected of him except to be a baby. Alas, that this infinity of gratification of fulfillment will never be achieved again as we grow up! Alas that so many of us yearn for those infantile epochs in adult life, and are only rewarded by neuroses, chagrin, or worse. This is the vanity of vanities.

The "world" teaches us as we grow to become socialized, to inhibit our infantile wilfulness. We are trained and educated to wear "the shoes" of many social selves. We become members of play groups, students in school, sons or daughters, brothers or sisters, members of teams, of clubs. We learn the role of training for a career, and after making such decisions, we seek to find our mates. We learn to play the part of lover or beloved. We become members of professions or trades, wives and mothers, husbands and fathers, in order to transmit and transform our social and human reality in and through our children for future generations.

But being-in-the-world with these social selves, wearing so many emotional "shoes" can often pinch our mental feet. Our emotional circulation feels choked, squeezed by the variety of "shoes" that must be worn in every day life. The soft "shoes" worn in the home are changed when one goes out to business or to meetings or to careers. The shoes that are worn in social events and in special circumstances may be of different styles and lasts. We are so busy getting ahead, achieving, that being gets trampled as "bunions", callouses and other conditions grow on the self. To be able to take off these "shoes" from time to time, to restimulate and re-energize the inner self, the real being, is what each of us must learn. In encounters, in real dialogue with others close and near persons, we can scratch when it itches.

How is this learned? In childhood this is experienced and learned by the encounters with parents who love and are loved in turn. Then, being a child and experiencing loving are the nutrients that make for survival and for emotional and personality growth. As one grows older and is socialized, one must learn to know, to be able to perceive the differences between those experiences in which we are manipulated or manipulate in kind, from those which represent encounters which free us to wear our own respective shoes of being without being trod upon or pushed, or trampled. For love, like blood, feeds as it cleanses. Like the blood stream, love in real human encounters nourishes being — permits for the discharge of the wastes of living as its brings strength to existence.

Dante in "Paradiso" said, "If it itches, scratch". Being permits us to risk scratching when we itch. Loving affords us the actual experience. When we understand how it is to be a person and to confront the dilemmas which existence brings upon us by virtue of being human and thus limited to a given span of years, we can afford to take off our social "shoes" without fear and to run barefoot, appropriately and re-creatively. Without being, no infant could survive. Without the accompanying encounters of loving and knowing, neither the child nor the adult can long endure in the world in which we all live and exist.

To be able to be one's self, to have the experience of this self-consciousness which transcends the demands and exigencies of routines and role performance, requires courage. We have seen this courage in the lives and examples of great men and women. Albert Schweitzer is one of them. Martin Buber is another. The heroic Dr. Tom Dooley, who gave himself to healing the pain of others while dying of cancer, is another.

Everywhere we turn we can find lesser known persons among our families, friends, and acquaintances, in our business and professional circles, who have this quiet but preserving courage to be themselves, regardless of circumstances. But we need not look to heroes for guides. Each man is his own hero if he faces up to the Sphinx. The riddle is answered; "man", when we are asked what starts on four, walks on two, and finishes on three.

We find the courage to be in our own inner selves. The act of breathing, however involuntary, is an affirmative act if we are to endure. In our personal, social and spiritual lives, we daily contend with the dangers and risks involved in living. With patience and fortitude these hazards are overcome. Anyone who rides in big city traffic faces death at any moment. It is an act of courage to risk such hazards. Yet most people do so without hesitation.

Every trip we take, whether for short or long distances, carries with it a fear of never returning, as if each trip were a final separation. This is part and parcel of the very nature of being a human. Living is one long journey, more than from a sleep to a sleep. Gradually as we grow we become aware of the fact that each of us is time-limited on the earth, that as one grows, one nears the end, and this can be at one and the same time an inspiring and joyful realization. It gives every breath, every activity, every association a sense of joy.

Those who pray know what this can mean. Consciously or otherwise, most people show that death holds no fear, if we are to go by the high marriage and birth-rates, the continuing enlargement of families, and the looking toward the future of human beings.

For being in the world, and looking towards the future as full of possibility, is a courageous answer to the otherwise overpowering feeling of dread, which one inevitably carries. And the threat of nuclear warfare only heightens the personal dilemma between courage and despair as it sharpens the global universality of the choices and consequences before us.

By our daily work and creative activities, our faith in the future is constantly renewed. Most parents will say they are building a future for their families and see the potential proof of it before their eyes, and in their hearts. Most diplomats share this hope and motive, too. Out of these feelings, this awareness and consciousness, people transcend or overcome the inhibiting dread of death, despair. By so doing through shared experiences, creative fulfilment of the self and one's family and group are achieved.

III.

Such experiences do not occur in a vacuum, in a lonely cave or attic. The child could not be, unless he had daily and regular encounters with adults who cared for and loved him. None of us can be ourselves, without encounters with others who will give us back not only the mirror image of ourselves, but the living awareness that we are human. Even the space travellers, Sheppard and Gagarin demonstrated this, when in their orbital flights in space they were in constant radio communication with their bases. Encounter really is a dialogue between persons who care about themselves as persons and see in each other a shared humanity, an eternal human experience which is renewed and transmitted into the future.

One must learn to make of each meeting with another person an encounter, a dialogue in being. This means that in ordinary contacts in which sympathy is required for getting together to achieve common ends, two higher degrees of understanding must be sought. One must be not only sympathetic, but empathetic, that is, to be able to put one-self into the "shoes of the other person's self". In this way we begin to understand that others like us can feel dread, courage, fear, anxiety, joy, etc.

And yet one must be able to go above being in the other's "shoes". This must lead to the encounter, which Buber says — all life is, namely, that all real living is encounter in the sense of human togetherness. In this encountering give and take or dialogue, one must be compathetic, or be able to stand on the grounds of one's own self, to occupy one's own "shoes", so to speak. In this way one understands oneself and the other and is in turn so experienced without requiring or demanding or exchanging or reciprocating or retaliating, etc.

To be means one must love, both oneself in the right way and the other in a responsible way. This being and loving lead to knowing of oneself as a human and of another regardless of the roles being exchanged and inter-acted. Being, loving, knowing are the three major categories of experience in the life of encounter. This means being free and responsible at the same time, to be able to recognize finitude and at the same time unlimited potentialities that can be actualized and experienced.

It means accumulating "moments of truth" in daily life, which makes that life worthwhile, with a present and a future, in which the past is always prelude. It is an affirmative life, the life of encounter. It is here and now. It means that the pain of being conscious can become the potentiality for fulfilling one's abilities and capacities, not only in the physical world, but in the human world, which we occupy and from which we derive our real meaning as human beings.*

The life of encounter is the answer to the question which the poet has asked, to the despair which the philosophers and theologians and psychologists have presented to us, reflecting back our anxiety and insecurity. It is the way to conform to the demands of every day life, and the same time to retain the individuality which makes life worthwhile.

T. S. Eliot has asked us: "Where is the life lost in living? Where is the wisdom lost in knowledge?". The life of encounter is the recovery of the meaningfulness of living as human beings, and it restores to human wisdom the knowledge which is constantly growing in the physical, social, natural, and psychological sciences.

"Be yourself", is possible for each of us. In being and becoming so, we become personalities who can find in work, love, friendship, faith, the humour, the joy, and the courage to be part of a marvellous world, ready for our discovery and unfolding.

THE LONG-NEGLECTED BENE-ISRAEL COMMUNITY OF INDIA

synagogue in Bombay, which was later called "Mogen David".

In 1836, a Jewish teacher, Solomon Shurabbi, came to Bombay, and remained for twenty years, instructing the Bene-Israel in Jewish ways. Later on, the wealthy Jewish Sassoon family, who were Iraqi Jews, and who had made their fortune in India, helped the Bene-Israel. One finds a gap in the last forty years, and now, due to the efforts of Rabby Gryn, there is a resurgence of the Jewish life among the Bene-Israel.

The names of the Bene-Israel are a Hebrew-Hindu combination. The family name was derived from the town or village in which they lived. Thus we find Jews who lived in Pen, called Penkar, those in Kehim, Kehimkar. The first names are Jacob, David, Solomon, etc. You may meet David Penkar and Jacob Kehimkar among the Bene-Israel.

The men of this community formerly wore turbans, then Turkish fezzes, and today cannot be distinguished by dress or appearance from their Indian neighbors. The women all wear Saris, the national dress of India. The language spoken is Marathi. The "oil pressing" days are over for most of the Bene-Israel. Many of the community became soldiers for the East Indian Company in the 19th century, and rose to high rank. Today we find the Bene-Israel in professions and vocations.

The marriage customs of the Bene-Israel will give the reader some indication of how the Indian and Muslim influences have intermingled with Hebrew traditions. The Bene-Israel do not use the "dowry system" which is so prevalent in India and also among the other Jewish groups in India. The majority of marriages are arranged by "professional matchmakers" who receive their rewards in the form of gold rings given to them by the families of the bride and groom.

The Jewish custom which has remained as part of the wedding is the "breaking of the glass" during the wedding ceremony, in order to remember the destruction of the temples in Jerusalem. The Muslim influence is the application of "Haldi Paste" to all relatives and friends (a spot on the forehead). The Hindu influence is that of holding the wedding on an "auspicious day" which is carefully calculated and determined by an astrologer. After the wedding ceremony, the wedding feast is held. An ancient custom is observed when the groom and bride feed each other with five morsels of a sweet dish.

After the establishment of Israel in 1948, many young men and women of the Bene-Israel heeded the call of the "homeland", and seven thousand came to Israel. There they settled on "Kibbutzim" and many learned trades and vocations. They also served in the Israeli armed forces.

A strange paradox emerged during July of 1961. The Orthodox Jewish body in Israel, in the name of the Chief Rabbi, classified the Bene-Israel group as "Non-Jews because for many years this community had been cut off from the mainstream of Judaism. At the same time, the Union of Oxthodox Jewish Congregations of America reported in their Bulletin, "Jewish Action" (Summer 1961):

> ". . . The first Bene-Israel student to be awarded a U.O.J.C.O.A. scholarship has arrived in Israel where he will be trained for the rabbinate at the renowned Kol Israel Yeshiva . . . The Union also has made available funds for a Chazan (Cantor) for the Panvel community, and has shipped 200 pairs of Tefillin to the Orthodox Union in India . . ."

The report goes on to relate that a large shipment of prayerbooks has also been forwarded to India. Truth is stranger than fiction.

Although small in number, the Bene-Israel Jews of India have kept some Jewish identification throughout their colorful and sometimes tragic history. There is no anti-Semitism in India, and they have lived side by side with their Indian neighbors, and still held onto some Jewish ideals. There are presently 15,000 Bene-Israel Jews left in India. O.R.T. is planning to establish a vocational school in India. There is a beginning of "competition" among the major religious American Jewish groups to help this long neglected group.

The Bene-Israel group, who had such a history, and who have retained some form of Jewish identity, should certainly be accepted as "Jews". Moshe Sharett, Chairman of the Jewish Agency, recently stated: "A Jew is first of all someone who is conscious of being a Jew; consciousness determines the sociological and political facts of life."

THE ROLE OF LAW IN INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS AS ILLUSTRATED BY THE EICHMANN CASE

ing to the appropriate reach of the legal system of Israel. Let me illustrate what that really means. Supposing that New Jersey should pass a statute, a homicide statute, the ordinary statute making murder a crime punishable by life imprisonment or death. Supposing, however, that the statute should by its terms provide that it applies to anyone who murders anybody anywhere in the entire world. Suppose that a Frenchman murdered another Frenchman, in Paris, and subsequently took a trip to New Jersey, and was arrested in New Jersey and tried for murder. What about that?

Now, I think that if he challenged the New Jersey Statute under the Constitution of the United States, the Supreme Court of the United States would hold that New Jersey had no jurisdiction. I am inclined to think that the case would never reach the Supreme Court of the United States, that the New Jersey courts would find some way to construe that statute, to say that the statute was not meant to apply to homicide committed in France by one Frenchman against another Frenchman; that such an application would lie well beyond the reach of the legal system of New Jersey.

Let me pause for a moment on that phrase, "reach of the legal system." You notice this is not a question of jurisdiction over the person of the defendant. In the hypothetical case I just gave you, that Frenchman came to New Jersey. There is no question that New Jersey arrested him in New Jersey and had jurisdiction over the person. That was perfectly clear. The question was not a question of the jurisdiction of the court over the defendant. The question was what is the proper reach of the legal system of New Jersey? As American lawyers, we are familiar with this.

What if there were a California statute under which the California authorities tried to collect taxes from a client of yours who might tell you, "I am a resident of New Jersey, all of my income is earned in New Jersey, I happened to visit my daughter in California for three days last year, but by what right do they purport to assess me for income tax?"What about other cases which are somewhat closer to the borderline than that one? Such questions also arise now not merely between states of the United States but internationally, and they arise in a much more difficult form than the homicide case. The homicide case is difficult enough, and the French might have protested as well as the man who was captured.

Indeed, there is a famous New Jersey case, Ex parte Wilderhus, which involved a murder committed aboard a Belgian vessel in one of the New Jersey ports. Now, the murder was by one member of the Belgian crew of another member of the Belgian crew. It was below deck, so that delicate sensibilities of the New Jersey population were not offended. They didn't hear any of the outcries, they didn't see the blood. But the New Jersey authorities arrested the man and undertook to prosecute him for murder, and the Belgian diplomatic authorities intervened and challenged the jurisdiction of New Jersey to prosecute him. Now, I point out to you that really Belgium didn't concern itself much in any substantive case. Murder was murder. They were merely saying in effect: We want to prosecute this man and condemn him rather than have you do so. Both states agreed that the acts constituted a fundamental crime. But the laws of states are not always that much in harmony.

We, for instance, in the United States make it unlawful to engage in a whole variety of business practices, which violate the anti-trust laws, Federal Trade Commission Act, Clayton Act, and so on. That type of behavior in many other parts of the world is quite lawful. And as you also know, modern American business extends all over the world, and American enterprises have business relations with enterprises of many other countries. You therefore get the kind of case which I am now talking about under circumstances where the mutual irritation between the countries is much more acute than it would be if the issue were merely who had a right to prosecute the man for murder.

There is, for instance, one of the aluminum company cases — if any of you should be interested in the citations, I have them here and will give them to you later — in which the United States in a proceeding in the Federal Courts challenged the behavior of a group of foreign companies, all of the behavior having taken place outside of the United States. These were French and British and German companies and Swiss, and all they did was to agree to limit their production of aluminum and to limit their sales to all customers in accordance with agreed quotas. The agreement applied to all their sales, and therefore included sales destined for the American market. They made their agreements abroad. They themselves were foreign corporations.

The United States, because one or two of them happened to have branch offices in the United States, which were here for entirely different purposes, used that as a basis for getting jurisdiction of the person over these companies. A decree issued, and the Circuit Court of Appeals for the second Circuit affirmed the decree against them. The opinion was written by Judge Learned Hand. He said: Yes, it is true, this conduct all took place outside of the United States, and it is equally true they are all foreign corporations — foreign in the true sense, not merely in the technical sense — but their acts had effects within the United States, and since they knew perfectly well those acts would have effects in the United States, they are chargeable with the intention of causing these effects within the United States.

The effect, you see, from the point of view of France and Germany is that their companies in France and in Germany, when they enter into arrangements with one another, must now worry not only about French and German law, but must also worry about American law. And with America representing roughly fifty per cent of the market of the free world, it is rather difficult for large enterprises anywhere to engage in agreements of any sort concerning production or sales which aren't going to effect the American economy.

There is another case which is even more striking. This involved a proceeding against duPont in this country and Imperial Chemical, Limited, in England, and as one phase of the case a District Judge of the United States issued a decree against Imperial Chemical Company of England prohibiting the Imperial Chemical Company of England from using its patent rights to exclude American sales into England. Imperial Chemical had a contract with another British group of companies under which it gave them an exclusive license to its patent; and the decree prohibited them from giving effect to that exclusive licensing agreement. Now, not only was this agreement lawful under British law, but under the British patent law, as construed by the British courts, Imperial Chemical had a duty to do the very things which the decree of the U.S. District Court purported to prohibit them from doing. Now, this happened as between the United States and Britain, and they are notoriously polite to one another.

The District Judge in his opinion said he would include such-and-such a paragraph in the decree — the paragraph which I am talking about —, although he was aware it might be difficult to enforce in England because it might conflict with the views of British courts concerning British law. If so, he said, he would then consider what to do about it.

And when the case came up in the British courts, it came up in the form of a suit by the license against Imperial Chemical, insisting that Imperial Chemical Company go through with its licensing arrangement. The British court politely said, as it read the U. S. District Court's opinion, it interpreted that opinion to mean that the U. S. District Judge didn't want the British court to enforce his decree if the decree ran contrary to British law. Therefore, the British court felt it could order Imperial Chemical to do that which otherwise would have been a violation of the decree of the Federal District Court.

This sort of problem comes up in other situations, such as cases involving legislation. There is a case you may be familiar with, of a British seaman who signed aboard a British ship in Britain. He agreed to serve for the full voyage of two years or more and to collect his pay only on his return to England, The ship stopped at Pensacola, Florida, for two days. He jumped ship and brought a suit, under the Lafollette Seaman's Act, against his British employers, demanding half-pay right then and there. The court gave him his judgment, despite the fact that this was a British seaman who had signed his contract in England, to be performed on the ship throughout the world. She was a ship of British flag registry.

This sort of problem arises over and over again in taxation. There is the case of an American company which manufactured cloth. It bought a fiber in India. All it did in India was to buy some of this fiber there. But it brought the fiber back, manufactured the cloth in this country, and sold it in this country and in Latin America. As far as the record showed, none of the goods ever found their way to India. But the Indian Government assessed income tax against the company on the theory that when it bought the fiber in India, it did enough in India to make it chargeable with earning income in India. And so it goes. Other example of such problems could be cited and multiplied. Unlike the simple homicide cases which we discussed earlier, these cases are not clarified by the simple feeling on all hands that basically we all agree as to the substance of the matter. Quite the contrary, in connection with taxation and regulation, all too often the respective countries don't agree. Problems of this sort find their way in increasing numbers into the offices of practicing lawyers.

Now, let me try to carry you a little further into an analysis of the second — the intermediate — set of problems. The second set involves the problem raised by a request on the part of Eichmann to the Israeli court — which we may anticipate — that the court dismiss for lack of jurisdiction over his person, because he was kidnapped and brought within Israel by force. This sounds like a rather unique case, doesn't it? It did to me, until I started checking. It turns out that there is a good deal of precedent concerning this question. Much of it comes from the Supreme Court of the United States.

The first case was Kerr against Illinois, about a hundred years ago, which has its amusing aspects. Illinois wanted Kerr for embezzlement. He had thoughtfully left Illinois and had travelled to Peru in South America. The United States had an extradition treaty with Peru. The President of the United States, through proper proceedings, issued a warrant to an appropriate officer who was designated to go to Peru, apply to the Peruvian authorities under the extradition treaty, to request extradition of Kerr.

He seems to have been a man who liked things done briefly. For reasons which don't appear at all in the reports, when he got to Peru, he decided not to present his commission, his warrant and all the rest of it to the Peruvian authorities. He found the man and confronted him with a gun and, saying in effect, "You come with me", put him aboard a cruiser, and brought him back to California. The California authorities had no business with the case by any theory, but they obligingly assisted in the arrest, and helped to ship the prisoner to Illinois, where he was prosecuted for embezzlement. He was convicted.

The case was brought to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was pointed out that he had been kidnapped by an official, his rights had been violated not only by Federal officers but by California officers and by Illinois officers, and that on top of everything else the actions of the President's emissary had been in violation of our treaty with Peru.

The Supreme Court said this might well be true; Peru might very well have a grievance against the United States, which it could press through appropriate international channels; the prisoner perhaps might some day have a claim against the people who had kidnapped him; but nevertheless there was nothing wrong with the Illinois judgment of conviction. Illinois had jurisdiction over the person charged with embezzlement. He was given a fair trial, he was convicted; and there is nothing, said the Supreme Court of the United States, which we can do about it, nor indeed which we ought to do about it.

That has come up at least five times in the past hundred years in the Supreme Court of the United States, and on each occasion the Supreme Court has taken the same position.

On occasion, the man kidnapped was kidnapped by so-called volunteers. On other occasions, he was kidnapped by the officials of the state which prosecuted him. In some cases, it was the prisoner who complained; and in at least one case it was the governor of the state from which he had been kidnapped who complained against the state into which the prisoner had been abducted and where he was prosecuted. Uniformly, the judgment of the Supreme Court has been that there was nothing wrong with the prosecution. The prosecuting state, having jurisdiction over the person, might try him and convict him.

British courts have taken the same position consistently for a hundred years. I have found only one case to the contrary. This was a case in a French tribunal. An energetic French policeman had kidnapped a man in Belgium and brought him down to France for trial. This one court said: We are just not going to prosecute this fellow, and dismissed the case, saying: You can't bring people into our court in that way.

Strange as it may seem, then, this kind of thing has happened over and over again. The generally uniform practice of states has been to the effect that such a kidnapping does not invalidate the prosecution or subsequent conviction by the state into which the prisoner had been brought by force.

Now let us return to the third phase of implications of the case, involving the reach of the legal system of Israel. Under established doctrines of international law, a state may extend its statures, may extend its legal system to any conduct that takes place within its own territory. That is obvious enough. It may also extend the reach of its statute to anyone who is a national of that state, wherever he may be, and that is obvious enough. As one moves away from the foregoing categories, the clarity of the law gives way to dimness.

There is a third category of jurisdiction which is sometimes referred to as protective jurisdiction. The best illustration I can give are laws against counterfeiting. If a Dutchman counterfeits French currency in Holland, if he should subsequently be arrested by the French authorities, they may prosecute, and it is held widely that this is a proper extension of Dutch legislative power.

Then there is a fourth category about which there's much disagreement, but which some states purport to apply, which is known as "passive personality". The gist of it is this: If the victim of the crime was one of a state's own nationals, the state may apply its law to the crime and prosecute.

There is a fifth category, called "universality". There are a limited number of crimes — just two, perhaps — which are well established, with respect to which all states and all legal systems agree that anybody who can find the fellow has a right to prosecute. The first is piracy. It is a general principle of law of all states and of public international law that whoever captures a pirate has a right to prosecute him for piracy. The second is slavery and the slave trade. Again it is well established that any state who captures a man who engages in the slave trade anywhere may prosecute and convict him for slavery.

I pause here to draw your attention to a procedural question. Typically, a challenge to the conduct of a state under international law may only be raised by the state of which the victim is a national. In the Eichmann case, the only state which can raise that question is the Federal Republic of Germany (or possibly East Germany if the latter should claim that Eichmann was a national of East Germany.) Neither of those states has manifested the slightest desire to do so. They have let it be understood that they are not interested. They apparently want him brought to judgment, and don't want to intervene.

So in a strictly lawyer's sense, one might agree that this question doesn't arise since the only party capable of bringing the case has made it quite clear that it won't do so. That would end the case in the technical legal sense, perhaps, but not in the larger substantive sense.

Now, let me again remind you of some of the cases I mentioned before, and their implications. What happens when the laws of different states reach out in such a way that people who travel around the world on enterprises which do business in two or ten or twenty states, as so many companies do today, find themselves in a position where they are just caught? They can be whipsawed, as Imperial Chemical Industries was in danger of being whipsawed between American and British law; as the French and German companies in the Aluminum, Ltd., case were between American and French and German law. What would happen if one of the states involved should undertake seriously to challenge the other?

We came very close to such a challenge even with so old a friend as Britain. In one case, the United States ordered the Anglo-American Oil Company to produce certain documents in an anti-trust proceeding in the American courts. The British Government intervened diplomatically. It sent a note to the Department of State of the United States, saying in effect: The Anglo-American Oil Company is forty per cent owned by the British Government. It is a vital instrument for British national defense, for the fueling of our Navy. We will not allow them to produce these documents in an American court or a British court or any place else without our consent, and we ask you to intervene with the American courts and put an end to it. This could have become a very sensitive situation.

And there is at least one dramatic case, in which such an issue was squarely raised. It was a relatively simple one. It involved a French ship in the Mediterranean on the high seas which rammed a Turkish ship. Eight Turks were killed in the collision. The French ship subsequently went on to Istanbul, where the Turkish authorities arrested the officers and prosecuted them for homicide, under the Turkish statute, which was broad in its terms. It applied to anybody who committed one of these crimes anywhere. The Government of France brought a proceeding against Turkey in the Permanent Court of International Justice — this is the famous case of the S. S. Lotus, (the name of the ship) — and insisted that international law prohibited Turkey from conducting this kind of prosecution.

Now, all of us who are familiar with the Federal system in the United States will recognize what this represented and what it potentially could represent. We all know that in the United States if the law of one state, New Jersey, purports to tax a man in California, or purports to regulate business conduct in California, we all know that in the United States the Supreme Court is available to act as an arbiter in this sort of situation.

Internationally, is there any arbiter? Would there be one if a real row should develop? If Germany should really bring a serious proceeding against Israel? Is there any authority anywhere to decide such an issue? Is there any system of principles and procedures anywhere which can resolve the question? Where do the limits of the legal system of any state really end? Is it a free-for-all? May each state extend its legal power as far out as it chooses? Are we back to the point where the only way to resolve this conflict is by conflict in the violent sense, that is by war between the states involved?

In the Lotus case, the court went all around the problem and finally ducked it. They ducked it in a time-honored way, which American lawyers will recognize. The court figured out that although the collision happened on the high seas, the Turkish ship was really Turkish territory, and therefore the killing could be compared to a killing by a man standing in Canada and shooting across the border into New York State; that's a crime under New York law, and New York could prosecute. So therefore, the court concluded, could Turkey in the Lotus case. It was a seven to six decision even on this basis. It's the only thing in contemporary law to suggest that there might be some situations in which the International Court of Justice would intervene and try to exercise a regulating and adjusting function between the powers of different states similar to that which the Supreme Court of the United States has exercised within this country.

Now, what about the question of the retroactivity of the crime? And what about the substantive question at the core of the case? If this did come up in an international tribunal, would the State of Israel have a valid case under international law, or would she merely be in a position where she might do as Cuba has done, as Egypt has done, in effect say: We are going to do this, because there's no one to stop us?

The terms of the statute of Israel which I referred to describe a pinch salt

one cup sugar
two ounces potato starch
juice and rind of a lemon

In a large bowl beat egg whites with an electric mixer until stiff. Add sugar slowly. Sift together cake flour, potato starch, and salt three times. Beat egg yolks and add juice and rind of lemon. Add to the beaten egg whites, alternately the cake flour mixture and beaten egg yolks. Pour batter into a slightly-greased tube pan and bake at 375 degrees for thirty minutes. TRADITIONAL HONEY CAKE three and three-quarters cups sifted all-purpose flour

one teaspoon salt
one and one-half teaspoons baking powder
one teaspoon allspice
one teaspoon cinnamon
one teaspoon baking soda
one-quarter cup vegetable shortening
one-half teaspoon cloves
one-quarter cup salad oil
one cup sugar
four eggs
one-half cup strong hot coffee
one cup strained honey
two tablespoons brandy or wine
one cup seedless raisins
one-half cup walnuts (chopped)

Sift flour, measure and sift again with salt, baking powder, soda, allspice, cinnamon and cloves. Cream together shortening, oil, and sugar. Add eggs, one at a time, beating thoroughly after each addition. Combine hot coffee, honey, and wine. Add one-quarter cup of flour mixture to raisins and nuts. Toss to coat well. Add remaining flour and coffee-honey mixture alternately to the creamed mixture blending until smooth, after each addition; using low speed, if mixed electrically. Add raisins and nuts last, mixing in by hand. Turn into an oiled, paper lined pan, fifteen and one-half by ten and one-half baking pan. Bake in a moderately hot oven, of 350 degrees, for fifty to sixty minutes, or until center of cake tests done. Cool in the pan. Store tightly covered. This keeps very well for a week or longer; and can be made ahead of time, and frozen.

MONTREAL MEETINGS

● CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS ●

Samuel Bronfman, national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress; and Michael Garber, Q.C., chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, both of Montreal, participated in international Jewish meetings held in Geneva, among them sessions of the World Conference of Jewish Organizations (COJO), headed by the praesidium of COJO which comprises: Dr. Nahum Goldmann (World Jewish Congress); Sir Barnett Janner, M.P. (Board of Deputies of British Jews); and Label A. Katz, American head of Bnai Brith. Represented were: the American Jewish Congress; the Canadian Jewish Congress; the World Jewish Congress; Board of Deputies of British Jews; Bnai Brith; Jewish Labour Committee; Conseil Representatif de Juifs de France; DAIA (Argentine); Council of Australian Jewry; and the Jewish Agency, by observers. The praesidium was empowered to draw up an agenda and prepare for an International Conference on Jewish Education in the summer of 1962, to be attended by Jewish educators and laymen; and will decide whether the Conference is to be held in Jerusalem or in some European center. The Conference also discussed the position of Jews in Russia. COJO's agenda included problems confronting North African Jewry, Middle East issues, the Arab refugee situation, and the impact upon world opinion of the Adolf Eichmann trial. Discussion was also held on the proposed submission to the Ecumenical Council. Michael Garber, Q.C., spoke on this subject. The draft of the proposed submission will be reviewed by every COJO member organization. Samuel Bronfman, chairman of the North American Executive of the World Jewish Congress, spoke at its sessions in Geneva. Dr. Nahum Goldmann reviewed the situation of Jews in various countries. A report prepared by the World Jewish Congress political department on the present situation of the Jews in Russia indicated that "the situation remains acute and difficult". It was noted that some progress has been made recently in the field of Jewish culture, but stressed that "there is a painful absence of any improvement" in the general conditions under which the Jews live in the Soviet Union. The report emphasized that there are "serious shortages of prayerbooks and ritual objects," and that the most important issue as far as Russian Jewry is concerned was "their enforced separation from their brethren abroad, from their relatives and friends in Israel and in other countries." Another section of the report dealt with the situation of the Jews in Cuba under the Castro regime. "Careful scrutiny", the report said, "has not been able to uncover any anti-Semitism whatever in Cuba. On the contrary, we are satisfied that the regime in power is determined to suppress any form of racial discrimination". However, the report noted in regard to Cuba, the social and economic changes in that country "have resulted in a complete transformation of the economic foundation upon which the Jewish community rests. As a result, it is no longer possible for them to maintain their institutions and services which had formerly been financed by members of the community. A large proportion of Cuban Jewry, once totalling about 10,000, has left the island." The report dealt with the inaction of International Police Organization (Interpol) to apprehend former Nazis in hiding in various countries.

THE ROLE OF LAW IN INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS AS ILLUSTRATED BY THE EICHMANN CASE

crime against humanity and a war crime. The forms of the statute are verbatim, word for word, the same as those in the Charter of the International Nuremberg Tribunal. Furthermore, at least in the case of war crimes, there's a body of precedent which goes back at least to the eighteenth century, to the effect that certain crimes, abuses of behavior in time of war, recognized and called war crimes, may be punished by any state anywhere at any time.

You will recognize, of course, that the Constitution of the United States itself embodies this principle. Congress shall have power to punish piracy and other offenses against the law of nations. And in one of the Supreme Court decisions which grew out of the prosecution of one of the Japanese war crimes, the Supreme Court of the United States explicity affirmed the principle that any state may punish war crimes wherever and whenever committed. As seen, war crimes may, I think, on the basis of doctrine as well as good sense and principle, be assimilated to slavery and to piracy as the kind of crime which may be punished by anyone anywhere. This then would be the state of the law as to the propriety of the application of Israel's statute to Eichmann, I think, if the case could ever effectively be brought up.

What about the question of retroactivity? This is a problem which is familiar in our own legal system and many others. I myself don't consider that a really serious problem in the Eichmann case. The theory of non-retroactive statutes, ex post facto laws, and all the rest, is that you have no right to make criminal something which wasn't criminal when the man committed it. Well, when Eichmann committed his acts, they were in violation of well established doctrines of international law as they then stood. And it would be very hard, I think, to suggest that Eichmann would be surprised to learn that murdering six million people would not be thought by other people to be criminal. I don't see how in any substantive sense the question of retroactivity may be seriously raised.

Now, I told you that I would say a word about the concept of crime against the Jewish people although I have concentrated upon the case as it appears under the statutory provisions relating to war crimes and crimes against humanity. May I suggest that the Israeli statute's definition of crimes against the Jewish people has far-reaching implications, which do not appear on the surface.

Let's consider the kind of world in which we live today. There are Turks living on the island of Cyprus, for instance. There are Greeks in Turkey. There are Pakistanis in India. There are Indians in Pakistan. There are Arab refugees in various countries in the Middle East, including, I suppose, Israel. There are Germans in Russia and Germans in Poland. And although Americans and West Europeans are accustomed to think of refugee status as something that doesn't directly involve us, in a short number of years, the world may face a problem of minorities of Frenchmen in Algeria, or of Englishmen in East Africa. Indeed, we recently had to deal with the problem of a Belgian minority in the Congo.

It was the complete confusion and breakdown in the Congo, and the clash of Russian and American interests, and the dangers of war, which caused the U. N. to move into the Congo situation and start the process of establishing new machinery and evolving new doctrines for coping with situations of this kind. In the world in which we live and the world which we can foresee, the problem of what one does about minorities, or majorities who suddenly find themselves converted into minorities, while minorities become majorities and proceed to abuse other minorities who were previously majorities, this problem may repeatedly affect us. The significance and widespread potential incidence of this danger has been recognized in the proposal for a so-called genocide treaty.

At this point, may I leave the technical legal analysis and concentrate on the long-range implications? We have a world in which by law, through the United Nations Charter, which is a multilateral treaty to which almost one hundred states are parties — the number keeps increasing — resort to war is prohibited except in self-defense against armed attack. Given the nature of modern weapons and given the size of the antagonists who might meet in a war today, all of us feel profoundly that if that prohibition against war is not made to stick, none of us have a very happy future or perhaps not a very long one.

We therefore face the question, if war is outlawed, what do we put in its place? This is not an academic question, for all of the reasons which I have tried to bring home to you. The actions of states the great dramatic actions which make the headlines, like the Congo and Cuba and the Suez situation and the Venezuelan situation and the Dominican Republic and the U-2 make it clear that the question is anything but academic.

Also serious and potentially dangerous, although much less dramatic and less visible on the surface of things, is the effect of the attempts of states to cope with their own economic and social problems, who find that their own laws which endeavor to regulate their own business enterprises, their own labor unions, their own farm activities, their own monetary systems, are ineffective, because of the nature of the economy of the world today, just ineffective, unless the laws also reach out to govern other people.
